SIXTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION.

SENATE.

MONDAY, August 26, 1918.

(Legislative day of Thursday, August 22, 1918.)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock noon.

STIMULATION OF AGRICULTURE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In accordance with the general unanimous-consent agreement the Chair lays before the Senate the bill (H. R. 11945) to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purposes of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products," and the bill will continue the unfinished business, unless by unanimous consent it shall be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama suggests the absence of a quorum, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Baird	Hale	Nugent	Sterling
Bankhead	Henderson	Overman	Sutherland
Beckham	Johnson, S. Dak.	Penrose	Thomas
Borah	Jones, N. Mex.	Phelan	Townsend

Gerry	New	Smith, Ariz.
Gulon	Norris	Smoot

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] on account of the illness of his father. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. KIRBY. I desire to announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] is necessarily absent on official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-one Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Under the terms of the unanimous-consent agreement which becomes operative to-day, I ask that House bill 11945 be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business, House bill 11945, be temporarily laid aside. The unanimous-consent agreement requires that this shall be done by unanimous consent. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—CHANGES IN DRAFT AGE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by G. F. Turner, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 12731) amending the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask that the bill just received from the House of Representatives may be laid before the Senate and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill H. R. 12731 amending an act entitled "To authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I may state in this connection that the committee have met and practically agreed on a report. It is being printed now, and the bill will be reported and on the desks of Senators in about an hour.

There are some amendments pending, and I do not think the provisions of the bill will be changed that those amendments affect. I think we might proceed with the discussion of those amendments.

I will say to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] that the Senate committee have readopted, although not in the House bill, the so-called work-or-fight provision of the Senate bill, and they have adopted it in the same terms as it now appears in the Senate bill, which is on the desks of Senators. I think it will be in order to discuss that amendment. There are some amendments proposed to it, particularly by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. FLETCHER. I take it the Senate will proceed with the consideration of the Senate bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no matter at present before the Senate and a motion to take up for consideration the so-called man-power bill will, of course, be in order.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 4856.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Chair will lay the bill before the Senate.

IMPORTATIONS FOR RED CROSS FREE OF DUTY.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to ask unanimous consent to submit a report from the Committee on Finance and to ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Carolina? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SIMMONS. From the Committee on Finance I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 12704) to authorize the importation without the payment of duty of sundry articles for the American National Red Cross to be donated or used by it solely to or for the benefit of the land or naval forces of the United States or its allies, or for the relief of the civilian population of the United States, or of its allies, and I submit a report (No. 556) thereon. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. PENROSE. Do I understand that this is a report from a committee?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; a report from the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PENROSE. I did not know there had been a meeting of the committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say to the Senator that it is a report from that committee, and on account of the urgent necessity——

Mr. PENROSE. Has there been a meeting of the committee?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; but I will state the circumstances.

Mr. PENROSE. How was the bill reported?

Mr. SIMMONS. I was proceeding to state to the Senator the circumstances. On account of the great urgency of this matter the bill having passed the House——

Mr. PENROSE. Has the committee been polled?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; the committee has been polled. The Senator will not permit me to answer his question. The committee was polled and a majority of the committee signed the report. The Senator was not here when the committee was polled.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not want to mar the harmonious relations which prevail between me and the chairman of the Finance Committee——

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator objects, I will not press it.

Mr. PENROSE. I certainly do not object to the measure, but I do object to reporting the bill in this way. I have been in Washington steadily every day except from Saturday late in the afternoon until yesterday morning, and no one asked me whether I approved of this bill or disapproved of it. It seems to me like a pretty irregular way of conducting the business of the committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will state to the Senator that the representative of the committee, the clerk of the committee, who polled the committee, was directed to see every Senator on the committee he could find late Saturday evening, and he handed the bill back to me with a majority signing its report.

Mr. TOWNSEND. When was it polled?

Mr. SIMMONS. If there is the slightest objection to it, I will withdraw the report.

Mr. TOWNSEND. When was the poll taken?

Mr. SIMMONS. It was taken Saturday.

Mr. PENROSE. I am not going to be put in the position of objecting to the bill, but I do emphatically object to the method of its report. I should like to have read the names of the members of the committee who authorized the report of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read the names.

Mr. SIMMONS. I hope the Secretary will read the names.

The SECRETARY. Agreed to report favorably without amendment: Signed by Senators SIMMONS, SMITH of Georgia, MCCUMBER, LODGE, THOMAS, JONES of New Mexico, NUGENT, PENROSE, GERRY.

Mr. PENROSE. Some one must have had psychological communication with me during my absence and signed my name to it.

Mr. SIMMONS. On account of the persistent opposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania I withdraw the report.

Mr. PENROSE. I am not going to object.

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall call a meeting of the committee for the purpose of passing upon the question whether the Red Cross is to be allowed to receive donations from abroad without paying duty upon them or not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the report will be withdrawn.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not want to have the report withdrawn. I want to have the bill passed. I may have been laboring under some form of aphasia and signed my name without knowing it; I do not know. I hope the clerk of the Finance Committee will not proceed with such irregularities in the future. I hope the bill will be passed.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator from Pennsylvania does not press his objection, I shall not withdraw the report.

Mr. PENROSE. I never made an objection to the bill. I made objection to the method of the committee reporting it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator object to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. PENROSE. I never did object to the consideration of the bill, but I objected to the method of its report, to the highly irregular manner of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from North Carolina withdraws his request that the bill be recommitted and asks unanimous consent for its present consideration. Is there objection to the request for present consideration?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That during the continuance of the state of war now existing, and during the period of one year thereafter, there may be imported into the United States free of the payment of any import duty any articles of clothing, medicines, drugs, hospital supplies and equipment, goods, wool and cotton, and the products thereof, donated by any person or persons abroad and consigned to the American National Red Cross: Provided, That such articles or supplies are not to be sold, but are only to be donated or used by it solely to or for the benefit of the land or naval forces of the United States or of the allies of the United States, or for the relief of the civilian population of the United States or any of its said allies.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe such regulations as may be necessary to carry this act into effect.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PETITIONS.

Mr. LODGE presented petitions of sundry citizens of Boston, Malden, Everett, and Medford, all in the State of Massachusetts, praying for the enactment of legislation to commission pharmacists in the service, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of the congregations of sundry Protestant churches of Orono, Me., and a petition of sundry citizens of Dexter, Me., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BRANDEGEE (for Mr. MCLEAN) presented resolutions adopted by sundry Lithuanian citizens of Hartford, Conn., and by the Lithuanian Association of Bridgeport, Conn., pledging their support and loyalty to the United States and the allies, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also (for Mr. MCLEAN) presented petitions of sundry citizens of New London, New Haven, Norwalk, Bridgeport, Manchaster, Wallingford, Unionville, and Milford; of the congregations of the Broadbrook Congregational Church of Windsor Locks, the Methodist Episcopal Church of Warehouse Point; and of the Advent Christian Church of East Norwalk; of the Woman's Home Missionary Society of Manchester, all in the State of Connecticut, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented petitions of sundry citizens of Detroit, Shelby, Long Rapids, Empire, Ironwood, Tuscola, Hancock, Winona, Hastings, and North Muskegon, all in the State of Michigan, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SHERMAN:

A bill (S. 4882) granting a pension to Anna Redding; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. UNDERWOOD:

A bill (H. R. 4883) granting an increase of pension to Thad Parrish; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SUTHERLAND:

A bill (S. 4884) for the relief of Gideon C. Corley; to the Committee on Claims.

CHANGES IN DRAFT AGE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4856) to amend sections 2, 4, and 5 of an act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment offered to the committee amendment by the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to have the amendment to the amendment read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 19, in the committee amendment, after the word "woman," at the end of the line, insert a comma and the words "and the civil-service laws shall not apply to such person."

Mr. SHIELDS. I was going to withdraw that amendment and substitute another for it.

Mr. SMOOT. I will withhold the remarks I intended to make until the Senator submits his substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair desires to state to the Senator from Tennessee that under Rule XXI he can not withdraw it. The Chair understands that the question has been ruled upon in different ways and that the Senate at one time overruled the Vice President upon the subject. The Chair will submit the question to the Senate whether it is in order for the Senator to withdraw his amendment after the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Chair did not hear my request. I was going to ask unanimous consent to withdraw it and offer another amendment in lieu of it. I see no objection to that course by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If unanimous consent is given, the Chair, of course, will not intervene.

Mr. THOMAS. I should like to hear the proposed substitute before determining it.

Mr. SHIELDS. The substitute is in these words:

Provided, That no examination or status under the United States civil-service laws, rules, and regulations shall be required of the wives of soldiers and sailors applying for positions in the service of the United States during the war.

It is in substance the same thing but stated in more clear and explicit language.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to rescinding the order for the yeas and nays and permitting the Senator from Tennessee to offer this amendment in lieu of the one proposed?

Mr. SMOOT. Let me ask the Senator a question. Do I understand the Senator to offer it as an amendment to the committee amendment or as a substitute for the committee amendment?

Mr. SHIELDS. As an amendment to the committee amendment, section 5, page 6.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, I will ask the Secretary to read the amendment as it would read if amended by the amendment which the Senator from Tennessee has just sent to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the proposed amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. The reason why I ask is that it seems to me the amendment covers what is in subsection 5 of the bill. Let the Secretary now read subsection 5 as reported by the committee and then this as an amendment to it.

The SECRETARY. The Committee on Military Affairs reports the following amendment: On page 5, after line 6, to insert a separate paragraph, to be numbered 5, as follows:

5. The wife of a soldier or sailor serving in the present war shall not be disqualified for any position under the Government because she is a married woman.

To which Mr. SHIELDS offered the following proviso:

Provided, That no examination or status under the United States civil-service laws, rules, and regulations shall be required of the wives of soldiers and sailors applying for positions in the service of the United States during the war.

Mr. SHIELDS. I ask unanimous consent to offer the amendment to the amendment at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee for unanimous consent to submit his amendment?

Mr. THOMAS. I have no objection, provided it is understood that the call for the yeas and nays shall apply to the substitute as well as to the original amendment.

Mr. SHIELDS. I so understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that the call for the yeas and nays will have to be withdrawn, and the yeas and nays will have again to be called for.

Mr. THOMAS. Well, that can be done, of course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado object?

Mr. THOMAS. I do not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection. The pending question is on the modified amendment which has just been offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] for only a moment, in order that I may state one further fact as to the application of this amendment. In the discussion of the amendment as first offered on last Friday, I believe, it seems to be taken for granted that it would apply only to employment in the departments in the city of Washington, which was too narrow a construction, much narrower than the amendment was intended to have. The proposed amendment, if adopted, will operate much more extensively outside of the city of Washington than inside it. There would be, perhaps, thousands more of applications for such service throughout the United States than in the District of Columbia. It would apply to employment in the service of all internal revenue collectors and in all customhouses; in fact, in all agencies of the Federal Government in every State, in every county, in every city, and in every hamlet of the United States.

The amendment would especially apply and would have more beneficial effect, Mr. President, in the hundreds and thousands of fourth-class post offices in every county and in every hamlet in the United States. There are many such postmasters who will be taken or who will come within the purview of the amendment now proposed to the selective-draft law and who, of course, it is to be hoped will only be temporarily absent and when they return from foreign service will be restored to their civil-service status and to the offices they now hold. It is well, it is just and fair that their wives hold those positions during their absence and continue to earn a livelihood for their families.

In addition to the postmasters, there are clerkships in all of these post offices which can be held by these good women and a living thereby be earned for their families. It is especially for this vast number of men and their wives that this amendment is offered. I hope there is no one who will want to deprive the wives of fourth-class postmasters and clerks in these offices of the opportunity to earn some money with which to support their families, to aid in the scanty allowance, we may say, the Government gives them, although it is the most liberal in the world, and thus keep their families in as much comfort as possible in the absence of their husbands.

That is all I desire to say about the amendment at this time

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, this proposed amendment is class legislation, unwise legislation, and unnecessary legislation, of the most pronounced character, in my judgment. I am not surprised that it is offered, for I think the tendency of our legislation is all in class directions, and it is becoming constantly more so.

If I understand the amendment, should it become a law, the wife of a soldier serving in the ranks, whether she can read or write, whether she is fit or unfit, shall be given the right to hold office under the Government of the United States for the sole reason that she is the wife of a man who is serving in the ranks. That may be an excellent reason for disturbing the present condition of our civil service, but if it is, then, I do not perceive why it should be confined to the wives of soldiers. Every reason urged or that can be urged, in support of the amendment will apply with equal force to the mothers, the sisters, the sweethearts, the cousins, and the aunts of the men wearing the Government uniform. Why should we discriminate between the mother of the boy at the front who is unmarried and the wife of his brother at the front who is married? Why should we lower the present standards which are required for serving the Government in the one instance and not in the other?

We all know, Mr. President, that this amendment will operate, if it becomes a law, in a discriminatory way. Its beneficiaries will have the right to feel that they are a preferred class and should be accepted whenever there is competition with an outsider who is unfortunate enough not to be the wife of an active soldier.

I think, Mr. President, that while we owe a great debt to our soldiers, we are under some obligation to the rest of the people of the United States. There are many women in the United States, all of them loyal, who have been compelled to take very rigid examinations. I do not object to that at all. They have studied in order to prepare themselves for these examinations; they have passed the examinations, and they are upon the certified list. They need the compensation which they will receive from the Government in the event that they are employed. We propose now, through what seems to me to be a mistaken sentimentality, to set aside that large class of women who are just as good patriots as are the wives of the soldiers, and not only give preference to the wives of the soldiers, but to remove the necessity of their qualifying at all.

Mr. President, we have done many things in the way of legislation which have not commanded public approbation, but I do not know of anything that can be more likely to meet public disapproval than this amendment. I am sure, if it is enacted, that it will be followed, as it ought to be followed, by legislation applicable to the other relatives of the soldier, with the result that our civil-service system will not only be utterly demoralized but be made practically ineffective.

Mr. President, I am not enamored of the civil service, and I have not been for some time. I perceive very clearly that under the operation of the law, not because of it, the civil-service officials of the United States have organized, have affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, and they dictate terms to the Congress of the United States. I think that is a very sinister situation, and I have said so; but I certainly do not feel that the way to meet that situation is to let down the bars for a favored class and to invite them to come and serve the Government, whether they are fit to occupy the positions to which they are to be assigned or not.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Colorado to the fact that fourth-class postmasters and their clerks were only placed under the civil service by an Executive order made by President Taft, perhaps after the November election of 1912, and that they rendered just about as good service when they were subject to no civil-service examinations as they do now. I wish further to call attention to the fact that in Washington now the Civil Service Commission has waived examination in the cases of thousands of employees in the departments, and that it has been a general practice of the Civil Service Commission in emergencies to allow all the departments to appoint men and women for service therein for the term of six months without any civil-service status. That is done every day in the Census Bureau, in the office of the Internal Revenue Commissioner, and perhaps in other offices. Now, why should a discrimination be made in such cases and one not be made in favor of the wives of soldiers who are compelled to surrender their positions and absent themselves from home in the service of their country?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, it is true that fourth-class post offices have within recent times been covered into the civil service. I opposed it. I do not mean that I made any active or open opposition to it; I merely thought it not good policy and not required; but it was done, and it is the law. Now, because of the service which was rendered to the public by the occupants of those positions before they became subject to the civil service, the Senator thinks that this proposed amendment, if it becomes a law, will not disturb the situation. It might not, so far as that class of offices is concerned; but there are two fundamental weaknesses, I think, in the Senator's suggestion. The first is that the law is not abolished so that everybody can be eligible to these places. It is partially abolished, so that a privileged class may be given opportunity, without submitting to the general conditions, to apply for and receive these offices.

The other is that the Senator's amendment is not limited to that class of offices. There is no limitation upon it whatever. The wife of a soldier heretofore employed as a clerk in private life or who is only a housewife becomes eligible under this amendment to a position in the technical service. She is not required to take any examination; the mere fact that she is a soldier's wife and that he is at the front or in active service constitutes her only credentials for any office and for every office within the gift of the President of the United States or of Congress. And those credentials are exclusive.

So, Mr. President, I think that we should hesitate before setting a precedent which means the embarkation upon a further series of discriminatory acts. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] last Saturday night very pertinently suggested that the measure should be broadened so as to include the mothers and the sisters of our soldiers.

Mr. President, there is a great deal of assumption that such enactments as this are needed in order that the wives of soldiers may not suffer. The Government is paying to every soldier's wife $15 a month in addition to a similar sum which it deducts from his wages. This $15 a month is increased in proportion as the salary or compensation of the soldier is increased, and an added sum is given for every child of the couple. It is not a great deal in the individual instance, but in the aggregate it constitutes a tremendous burden upon the Treasury of the United States. Furthermore, Mr. President, there is in this country at the present time work for every man and woman who will work. There is abundant opportunity for healthy, light, remunerative occupation. There is no necessity, therefore, for Uncle Sam at this time to be playing the part of a rich relation, distributing his wealth in abundance to everybody who sees fit to ask for it, or whose conditions may appeal to the sentiment of the legislator.

I do not want to see this character of legislation started. I think the section of which the amendment is an amendment should not have been placed in the bill. I am not opposing that section. Perhaps that particular discrimination, if it exists, should be removed during the war; but this amendment offers a premium to ignorance and to inefficiency, to say nothing of the vast hordes of applicants who will throng the city of Washington and the other cities and communities to which the Senator from Tennessee refers, in the event it shall become a law, and every woman applying who is rejected will naturally and perhaps justly feel that she is being discriminated against under a law passed for her special benefit and protection. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President, on the adoption of the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, this proposal is fundamentally unsound and it ought to be rejected. The people of the country have the right to demand efficiency in our civil service just as they have the right to demand efficiency in our military service. Congress has determined heretofore that the merit system developed through competitive examination is better adapted to secure efficiency in the civil service than general appointments without examination by heads of departments. I know very well, as all Senators do, that our civil service is very far from perfect. I know, as we all do, that there are instances of inefficiency notwithstanding the competitive examinations and appointments after such examination; but, so long as we believe that the merit system is better than the old system we ought to adhere to it. If the proposal made by the Senator from Tennessee has any value at all, it leads to the conclusion that we ought to abolish wholly the civil-service rules and the civil-service examinations.

No one could exceed me in the desire to extend aid to any dependent wife of a soldier, and I will do it with the utmost liberality whenever occasion arises; but I am not willing to extend that aid through inefficient service to the Government in our public places. We ought to cling rather tenaciously, I think, to a system, whatever it may be, that will tend to bring competent men and women into public employment. We ought not in this way to destroy the value of the system that we have created with a good deal of pains. Even if it be not a very complete or perfect one, in my opinion it has done fairly well in the years that are gone. The next suggestion will, of course, be to allow everyone who has served in the Army of the United States admission to public office without any examination. Now, I want to make all possible provision for both the wives of soldiers and the soldiers themselves; but we ought not to make that provision at the expense of the public service, and we ought to insist upon whatever examination we think is desirable before anyone is admitted to employment by the Government.

I know that in these last months it has been found absolutely necessary to admit a great many employees without civil-service examination. I yield to that simply because it has been an inevitable, inexorable necessity. We have not had the time to equip our various departments with the employees necessary through the processes of the Civil Service Commission; but that is no reason whatever for the abandonment of the system in favor of any class of men or women.

I hope very much that the amendment will not receive the approval of the Senate, because I look upon it as the beginning of the overthrow of the system. I would rather contribute what little I can toward the betterment of the system than toward its destruction.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have no objection to the amendment as reported by the committee, although I think it is perfectly useless, for there is no rule of the Civil Service Commission that will bar the wife of a soldier or sailor of the United States from being employed under the civil-service rules to-day. There is a ruling of the Civil Service Commission that where an individual is employed under the civil-service rules in a few of the departments of the Government the wife of that individual shall not be employed under the civil-service rules. That will not apply to a soldier or a sailor; but if there is any doubt about it on the part of any Senator, I have no objection to the adoption of the amendment as reported by the committee. But I do want a vote upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS]. In reading the amendment offered to the committee amendment by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] I find that it is extremely broad, and it is virtually a direction to the Government of the United States to employ the wife of every sailor and every soldier, irrespective of whether or not they are capable of filling the positions or whether they are qualified in any way. It is simply a direction that they shall be employed.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FLETCHER in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. Right at that point—because I wish an understanding of the situation—let us take a concrete case. Suppose any one of these departments advertises that it wishes a hundred stenographers, and the wife of a soldier makes application for one of those positions. Even though she may have no knowledge whatever of stenography, how could the department refuse to accept her?

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I do not believe the department could do otherwise than accept her under this amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. They might try her, of course, and discharge her.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; they could do that.

Mr. McCUMBER. But with this amendment they would have no right to refuse her application.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHIELDS. May I interrupt the Senator to answer that question and, incidentally, answer the argument of the Senator from Utah? I will take just a moment.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator wants to ask a question or to answer the question of the Senator from North Dakota, well and good; but I will be through in just a moment, and then the Senator can proceed.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will really answer the question of the Senator from Utah, then, because he has made the same point that the Senator from North Dakota has made. It is this:

From the beginning of the history of the Government fourth-class postmasters were appointed without any examination, and their clerks. This will be the same law that existed before those men were placed under the civil-service law. It will be the same status or condition that existed before the clerks were placed under it; and, of course, the appointing power is not going to appoint anyone but those whom it has ascertained to be reasonably competent to discharge their duties, just as was done under the old system, which worked very well in the case of postmasters and their clerks. The construction placed upon this amendment by the Senator from Utah, as well as the Senator from North Dakota, is entirely strained and unreasonable and never would be followed by any authority having the power to appoint. They would always, of course, make a reasonable investigation and see that the applicant was reasonably competent to discharge the duties of the position for which she applied.

Mr. SMOOT. The comparison which the Senator makes is a very unhappy one. There never was a fourth-class postmaster appointed since I have been in public life, I will say, but that somebody has vouched for his ability to carry on the work of the office. They have been recommended first by some political organization, but in all cases they have been recommended by the Congressman from the district in which the applicant lived and, in many cases, indorsed by the Senators from the State in which the applicant lived.

Mr. SHIELDS. That is what the Senator from Tennessee said and what will be done under this law.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the amendment does not require any such thing. I want to read the amendment to the Senate and ask any Senator here if there is anything in this amendment that would require it:

Provided, That no examination or status under the United States civil-service laws, rules, and regulations shall be required of the wives of soldiers and sailors applying for positions in the service of the United States during the war.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, it simply places them in the same status as before the civil-service law was passed; nothing more and nothing less.

Mr. SMOOT. Why, Mr. President, the Senator talks about a post office. There may be in a city a hundred wives of soldiers or sailors, and under this amendment the Government is expected to employ them; and, in the case of selecting a postmistress, I want to ask, Mr. President, who is going to decide as between the one hundred which one of the hundred shall have the post office? Nothing in the rules and nothing in the regulations of the commission is to have anything to do with it, because they are all waived.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator really seriously make that inquiry, as to who will decide who shall be employed?

Mr. SMOOT. I am speaking now of the provisions of the amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator must believe that "politics is adjourned."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah if we have a civil-service law now in effect and practical operation in the conduct of the Government?

Mr. SMOOT. I will admit, Mr. President, that of late there have been so many persons employed by the Government and the demand has been so great that the requirements of the civil-service law have been relaxed.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Another question: Is it not a fact that the President, by Executive order, has relieved the Department of Labor entirely from the necessity of consulting the civil-service law?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know that the order went that far, Mr. President, but I do know that it has been next to suspended of late, and I suspect that it will continue to be so suspended.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not want to interrogate the Senator unduly, but he refers to the appointment of fourth-class postmasters. Does the Senator think that the appointment of fourth-class postmasters upon the recommendation of Members of Congress and Senators resulted in a desirable service, in a successful administration of the post-office affairs in the various communities?

Mr. SMOOT. I think that it resulted in as good a service as the service that is being given to-day.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If that is so, then of course the civil-service red tape and favoritism is not required to get good men.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course the Senator knows that under the civil-service law the post-office officials have a right to select from three applicants——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The three highest——

Mr. SMOOT. The three highest, and from those three they can select one, which, of course, gives the political administration in power a chance to select, no doubt, the one that they feel would be of most service to the party in power.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not want to inject my personal judgment into the remarks of the Senator from Utah; but if he will permit me to say so—and it is the result of many years of observation—I think the civil-service law is a fraud and a sham; that there is more favoritism under it than ever existed under the spoils system; that promotions are absolutely inhibited unless you cultivate the good will of the immediate chief of the clerk who is to be benefited. I think it is a fraud and a sham, and behind it there lurks more practical politics for the party in power than has ever been exercised under the spoils system.

Now, I do not know that that will look well in the Senator's speech, and if he does not like it he can strike it out; but that is my judgment.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Utah is not going to strike out of any remarks that he may make anything that the Senator from Michigan might say.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is very kind.

Mr. SMOOT. But I want to say this to the Senator: I have not been altogether enamored of the civil-service law myself; but I have taken the position that as long as we have a civil-service law, and as long as we are pretending to follow it, we ought to follow it strictly. That we are not doing to-day.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Then the matter of preference ought not to depend upon good looks or accommodating manners.

Mr. SMOOT. Or location. Now, Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator offering this amendment if he will not accept an amendment to it, so that it will read as follows:

That no examination or status under the United States civil-service laws, rules, and regulations shall be required of the wives of soldiers and sailors applying for positions they are capable of filling in the service of the United States during the war.

If they are to be employed—and I have no objection to saying that they may be—we ought at least to say that they must be capable of filling the positions.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, while that would be a reflection upon the appointing power—because no one but the Senator from Utah is going to assume that they will appoint incapable married women, and no incapable married woman will apply—as it makes no difference, I am willing to accept it. If the Senator wishes to come over on that, I am very glad to have him come over on an immaterial amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not said what I was going to do. I simply want to improve the amendment, but expect to vote against it even if my amendment is agreed to. But, Mr. President, I think the Senator takes the wrong position. Under the amendment they have no choice of appointment. They may be capable or they may not be capable.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator understood that I accepted his modification, did he not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Utah state the amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. After the word "positions," insert "they are capable of filling."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee accept that amendment?

Mr. SHIELDS. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays upon the amendment as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee, as modified by the suggestion of the Senator from Utah, to the amendment of the committee. Upon that the yeas and nays have been asked for. Is the request seconded?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I should like to know how the proposed change made by the Senator from Utah is going to change this amendment. The amendment simply provides that the departments shall accept the wives of soldiers and sailors without any examination whatever. So if a department advertised for a hundred stenographers, and 90 responded, and those 90 were all wives of soldiers, under the amendment as it reads the department would have to accept them. It would have no right to require any examination. The Senator from Utah proposes now that they shall accept them if they are found capable of filling the places. Well, how are you going to find out whether they are capable of filling the places unless you have some kind of an examination?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Try them out.

Mr. McCUMBER. Senators say, "Try them out." Well, now, that gets right back to what I stated in the beginning. The departments will have no right to refuse to accept them; but after having accepted them, of course they can discharge them if they are incompetent.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. They could do that even without the amendment suggested by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SHIELDS. May I suggest to the Senator that of course the word "capable" there means in the sense of qualified, which I think is the better word?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. SHIELDS. It would be so construed. I did not object to that, because that would be captious; but the Senator asks how would it be known that they are capable? How was it known that appointees of the Federal Government were qualified to discharge their duties for 100 years before the civil-service law was passed? How does the Senator from North Dakota now know that his clerk or his stenographer is capable of discharging the duties when he appoints them?

Mr. McCUMBER. I would not if I had to accept the clerk without examination.

Mr. SHIELDS. You always exercise your judgment and discretion, just as they did before the passage of the civil-service law and just as millions of business men now in the United States exercise it, before they employ clerks, confidential secretaries, and business agents of every kind; they exercise the same common sense and judgment.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is just what I propose to do. If I employ a stenographer, I am going to exercise the common sense of giving a dictation to her to see whether she can take it or not. The Senator would have the department denied that privilege. Now, that is all there is to it. There is no use of mincing the matter. The provision of the amendment says as clearly as the Senator can make it that they shall be accepted without any examination, because a civil-service examination could be modified to meet the situation. They may be less stringent than they have been in the past, as they are undoubtedly to-day, because the civil service did not present a sufficient number to draw from. Nevertheless here is a case where the postmaster proposition is not a parallel in any respect. Somebody vouches for the postmaster. No doubt the Senator would not recommend a postmaster who could neither read nor write, because he knows that he would be discharged. The central committee would not recommend such a person. But if the Senator's reasoning is good then he would have said, if there were 100 persons who wanted to be postmasters, any one of them can be a postmaster, and you have no right to examine any of them. All that you can do is to accept them and discharge them if they are found to be incompetent. The only person who is to pass judgment upon the question of competency is the person who is making the application. Nobody vouches for her if she wants a clerical position as to whether she can read or write in a legible manner. She alone is to determine whether she thinks she can fill the place.

Mr. SHIELDS. May I ask the Senator, in the case of the wives of two soldiers applying for the same position, would not the appointive power determine which was, in his opinion, best qualified for the position?

Mr. McCUMBER. How determine it if you can not examine them?

Mr. SHIELDS. There is nothing that prevents an examination. It simply prevents the Civil Service Commission from subjecting them to an examination. It leaves the law just as it was before the Civil Service Commission was established. There was an investigation, and there was an examination, and the person who was best qualified was appointed. If the Senator will read over his argument he will see the sophistry of it. He will likely want to strike it out of the RECORD.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the sophistry is entirely on the other side of this proposition. I am going to help out the wives of soldiers wherever they can be helped out. We have provided that they shall receive at least $30 a month; and if they have children they are to receive an additional number of dollars per month. We are doing that for them. There are a great many old women in the departments who can only earn a living through their own efforts. There are thousands of girls in the departments who have to take care of mothers who are old and dependent upon them and who are receiving nothing from the Government. I would not give any of these younger persons a preference over those. They are just as patriotic probably and would give just as much if they had it to give for the Government of the United States.

I think the Senator is far from justified when he applies the word "sophistry" to any argument that is made against the acceptance of any person for a position without any character of an examination. If the Senator would provide in his amendment that they shall be examined by some one, by such examination as the departments shall see fit to give, it would eliminate that objection. I think the civil-service examinations are in many instances ridiculous; I think very often you would find more efficient clerks among those who failed than among those who succeeded; but there ought to be some kind of an examination to determine the fitness of the applicant to perform the particular service that she seeks.

If I understand the true meaning of this amendment, when it says that you shall waive all civil-service examinations, it means that there shall be no examinations whatever, and you shall accept the individual upon her own application, and if she proves inefficient you can discharge her.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been demanded on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment. Is there a second?

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GERRY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER]. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. I do not see that Senator present and therefore withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and vote "nay."

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. PENROSE (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], and I observe that Senator has not voted, but on the assumption that if he were present he would vote with the committee I will permit my vote to stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] to the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] and vote "nay."

Mr. SHERMAN. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] and therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote I would vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] is paired with the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS].

Mr. WALSH (after having voted in the affirmative). I voted forgetting that I have a general pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. I transfer my pair with that Senator to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BENET] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think I will take the liberty of transferring my pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] and vote "nay."

So Mr. SHIELDS's amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to offer an amendment for the committee. It is just one word. After the word "position," in line 18, I move to insert the words "or appointment."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Following the amendment just agreed to the committee report to insert the following:

6. Soldiers and sailors, regardless of age, shall, when they are accepted as volunteers or when they shall have been drafted, be eligible to receive commissions in either the Army or Navy. They shall likewise be eligible to admission to officers' schools under such rules and regulations as may be adopted for entrance to such schools, but shall not be barred from or discriminated against on account of age.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the amendment just agreed to insert the following:

7. Any person under the age of 21 who shall have been accepted as a volunteer or who shall have been drafted and served in the Army or Navy shall be entitled, at the conclusion of the present war, to receive an education at the expense of the United States Government at approved educational institutions. The period of such education shall be equivalent in point of time to the period by him served in the Army and Navy, but shall not exceed two years. Application for such educational privilege shall be made within six months after discharge, and the applicant shall promptly begin his studies after his application shall have been approved.

Mr. POMERENE. If I may have the attention of the chairman of the committee, am I right in assuming that this section as drawn applies to all soldiers, sailors, and marines who may have entered into the service during this war and prior to the taking effect of this act as well as those who may be drafted under the amended law?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That was the purpose of the committee, and if the language is not broad enough to cover that, it should be made broader.

Mr. POMERENE. I assumed that was the purpose, but I thought it was probably not quite clear. With that understanding, I favor the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon if there is any estimate as to what this is going to cost the Government.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If the Senator from Utah asks me if there has been any estimate as to the probable cost of carrying out the terms of this section, I will say, "No." The committee adopted it without any reference to the War Department or without any discussion with the War Department as to their ability to carry it out or as to its probable cost.

Mr. SMOOT. Or as to the probable result.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, how can we have such an estimate when we consider the uncertainty involved in the service of these men who are going to war, and when we do not know how many will return? It will be impossible to estimate how many will return. I do not see how we can arrive at any estimate.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator from Utah will permit me, I desire to say that I think a rough estimate can be made, nevertheless. The statistics which were read by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] in the course of his speech last week were those showing the proportion of soldiers under age to those over age who constituted the Federal Army during the Civil War. I assume that out of four million of men it is highly probable that a fairly large proportion of men under the age of 21 will constitute our Army. I think, therefore, that 2,000,000 is a conservative estimate, even after the wastage of war shall be ended. That, of course, is an approximation, but if it is anywhere near right, then the result would be that the annual expense, estimating $1,000 a year as the cost of each student, and estimating one-half of the million men as taking advantage of the largess of the Government, would be a billion dollars. My own impression, however, is that the charge upon the Treasury will be very much more than that.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it seems to me that if we are going to enter this field at all the amendment ought to be guarded in some way. I myself think that the estimate which has been given by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] is about right. To whom is this money to paid? Nothing is said in the amendment as to what kind of educational institutions will be approved. There is not a word as to what these institutions after being approved shall charge each student. It is left entirely with the returning soldier to choose any one of the approved institutions. If any institution wants to charge $2,000 a year for a student, there is nothing whatever in this amendment to prevent its doing so. If the Government of the United States is going to pay all the expenses of educating the soldier for two years, under this amendment the institution itself could charge a thousand dollars without furnishing any of the necessaries of life that must be furnished to the soldier who goes to the institution.

I say, there is no telling what it is going to cost the Government of the United States; and I do not believe that legislation of this kind ought to be acted upon without some little information as to where it is going to lead to.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it seems to me that this amendment is largely declaratory of a principle and purpose of which I have an idea the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] is in favor; but it would be practically impossible at this time to go into details, either as to the limitation of expense or as to an estimate of the probable expense. My opinion is that there will not be nearly so many boys take advantage of this privilege as we should hope; but whatever the expense may be, there is not any possible doubt that the Government can invest money to no better purpose than the educating of these men after they come back. It would be one of the most unfortunate things that could happen to this country, not only morally and economically, but in every other way, to have these men, as we are drawing so largely from those under age, to come back and enter the life of this country without every advantage which can possibly be given to them to fit them for the battle of life.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Idaho that I fully agree with him as to the advantage that will come to our country through the education of its youth; I believe that they ought to be educated; but it seems to me if we are going into this field that the Government ought to do it itself rather than as provided for under this amendment.

Under the amendment the educational institutions of our country are to be selected and approved by the Government. We know that there will be enough of the soldiers who will want to take advantage of this legislation to require not only one large school but many large institutions throughout this country. Those institutions ought to be maintained by the Government and located at different parts of the country, if we are to enter upon this plan of education.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator does not understand that we are going to establish separate institutions to do this, does he?

Mr. SMOOT. Under this amendment we could not do it.

Mr. BORAH. The proposition is that we shall simply avail ourselves of different educational institutions of the country.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no limitation whatever as to the expense.

Mr. BORAH. Of course not; but that is a matter which can only be dealt with at the time, and will be dealt with at the time. It would be impossible for us to go into that matter in detail at this time. I do not see how the Senator could possibly estimate what it will cost to educate a young man two years from now or a year from now.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am not so much alarmed over what this is going to cost as to how it is going to be done. If the War Department has any plans worked out, it seems to me that legislation could be passed at this time for this purpose as well as it could be passed a year from now or two years from now. What I am complaining of now is that this amendment has been adopted by the committee at this time without any plan or system being worked out for the education of the boys at the close of the war.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from Utah?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The committee discussed that feature of the matter to some extent, but they did not feel that they ought to weigh the cost to the Government against the value of these young men as citizens after they came back from war and their education was completed by the Government. The outside limit of time they shall be kept at school at the expense of the Government is two years, and I fancy that a great many of them will not go to school at all. A great many of them will do as the returning soldiers did in the Civil War; when they come back into civil life they will have to go to work, and will go to work, because of having lost their positions and their opportunities to go forward. The committee therefore felt that the Government could well afford to expend a very large sum of money in order to educate these young men.

Mr. SMOOT. As I have just stated to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], the amount that the Government is to expend is not of so great importance as is the question as to where we are going to educate these young men and whether there should not be at this time some plan agreed upon by Congress and legislation passed that would carry it out, rather than that the Government should merely make a declaration, with no definite understanding as to just what plan will be adopted or how the object is to be accomplished.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the Senator will note that at the end of that section there is a provision in regard to the adoption of rules and regulations for carrying out the purpose of the section. It would be easier for the commander in Chief of the Army or those acting under his direction to make arrangements with the educational institutions of the country than for Congress to attempt to do so. It might be possible that the Government would conclude to carry on the educational work itself and at its own expense by the enlargement of West Point or in some other way; but to adopt a cut-and-dried plan in advance without knowing what conditions may confront the country at the time we thought would be unwise.

Mr. SMOOT. If that were the case, then it seems to me that the wise thing would have been to have waited another year, or for two years, if the war shall not end for two years, and then decide the question as to whether we shall carry on this work and at the same time provide how it shall be carried on and make a direct appropriation for it.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if it would not be possible here to limit the amount by limiting the scope of the education to be provided for by the Government. Take, for example, this situation: A young man may be a college graduate and yet, under the very general language of this amendment, he could insist on the right to take a postgraduate course at some institution and have the Government pay all of his expenses. Now, is it quite right or just that the Government should go that far?

Mr. BORAH. Suppose that he does do that, is that too much for the Government to do for the man who has gone over to Europe to fight this war at a time when he otherwise would have been taking his postgraduate course?

Mr. STERLING. No; I sympathize with the idea; but when I think of the great number of these men and what it will involve for the Government, I hesitate to agree that that shall be done.

Mr. BORAH. I do not think there is any question of dollars and cents in this proposal. The Government can afford to pay every dollar that it will cost to educate these men after they come back, because it is taking them at a time when they should be educating themselves.

Mr. STERLING. My thought is this, that it would be a generous government indeed that would say to the man who has not yet received an education equivalent to a high school education, or, even going further, who has not received an education equivalent to a two years' college course—the freshman and sophomore years of college—"the Government will provide the means for such an education."

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. I call the Senator's attention to the limitations in the provision, first, that the person must have entered the military service under the age of 21 years. That limits it to a certain class. Then, in the next place—

> The period of such education shall be equivalent in point of time to the period by him served in the Army and Navy, but shall not exceed two years.

That is another limitation. Then, that only those shall be admitted to the privilege who make application for such education within six months after their discharge. That is another limitation. Further, it is provided that—

> The applicant shall promptly begin his studies after his application shall have been approved.

Then, a further provision is that—

> Rules and regulations for carrying out this provision shall be promulgated by the President.

The President knows what it ought to cost. There is no danger of the country being imposed upon by any excessive charges by institutions such as suggested by the Senator from Utah, because it can be perfectly well ascertained what the annual cost should be. I think with all those limitations that there need not be any great fear of an unreasonable charge on the Treasury or a tremendous burden upon the Government.

I am inclined to agree with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] that this is not a question of dollars and cents, anyhow. Here are young men whose educations have been cut off, who have been taken out of school and college before they have completed their education and gone into the Army. The Government ought to stand the expense when they resume their education. I think that the whole idea is an excellent one and that we can not afford to weigh against this debt that we owe to these men the amount that it will cost to put them into a position where they might have been but for the war.

Now, as to the suggestion of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] in regard to according this privilege only to those who have in the past reached a certain stage in their educational career, it seems to me that would be an impractical sort of provision to put in the bill and that it would not be just and entirely equitable to make that sort of restriction. Of course the provision is pretty broad and general, but it has to be, for we can not estimate accurately how many men will be in this position and how much the cost will be.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I have already stated that I sympathize with the general purpose of this amendment. I believe that within certain limits—and I will say generous limits—the Government might well afford to educate the men who at the time of their enlistment were under 21 years of age and had not had prior to that time sufficient education or had been denied the privilege of an education; but how far shall we go? Shall we say to the college graduate who had completed his course before he was 21 years of age that now he shall be furnished the means whereby he can take a postgraduate course in some institution, or shall we limit this provision and say, in effect, that he shall have a reasonably good education for the times, an education that will fit him for the serious business of life or go far in fitting him for a profession even?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. STERLING. If the Senator will permit me, I will state where, if I should suggest any amendment at all to this amendment, I would have the amendment come in? In line 5, after the word "Navy," I would insert an amendment so that it would read:

> Any person under the age of 21 who shall have been accepted as a volunteer or who shall have been drafted and served in the Army or Navy—> and who shall not have received an education equivalent to a four-years' high-school course or an education equivalent to two years in college.

Then put in the words—

When you have done that, either one or the other, the Government has done a generous thing, something that no Government has ever done before in giving an education or in furnishing the means of an education to young men. I want to be generous, but I think we may err, Mr. President, in being too generous.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator now yield?

Mr. STERLING. I yield the floor.

Mr. McKELLAR. I merely wish to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. STERLING. Very well.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator asked how far shall we go. I will call the Senator's attention to the fact that so far as education is concerned in this country the Federal Government has practically gone nowhere in the past. The only educational contributions that have been made have been to the Naval Academy and the Military Academy, the students of which institutions comprise a very small portion of the scholastic population of our country. Is it not time that the Federal Government was doing something toward education, and can the Senator think of any better time to start or any better class of our people with which to start than these boys who have been deprived of an education by reason of having to fight and offer their lives for their country?

Mr. STERLING. I should like to ask the Senator from Tennessee what per cent of our young men and women ever have a high-school education, let alone taking any part of a college course? When the Government has provided a high-school education for the young men I say the Government has done generously; but I would be willing to go further than that, and, while not giving a complete college course, let the Government pay the expenses of two years in college.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator does not mean to say that the Federal Government has furnished a high-school education for them?

Mr. STERLING. Oh, no; I am not talking about that. I am just asking, as a general proposition, what per cent of our young men and young women have gone through the high school and graduated in this country, taking one State after another the country over? It is a comparatively small per cent. When the Government provides even a high-school education for these young men it provides more than is generally received by the young men and women throughout the land.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am surprised that this amendment should provoke even serious opposition. I prepared the amendment because I realized that the drafting of boys 18, 19, and 20 years of age imposes upon them peculiar hardships. May I invite your attention for a few minutes to two or three observations? I am sorry that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], who has just been asking for a restrictive amendment to the amendment, has left the Chamber.

The Senator is right when he says that a great many of our people never have a high-school education placed within their reach. That is the shame and the disgrace of our country. A high-school education ought to be placed within the reach of every citizen, and every citizen should be obliged to acquire that high-school education. Illiteracy in America is alarming, appalling, and degrading. We have been sneering at other nations and talking with curled lips about our superiority, and yet in point of literacy we are far below Sweden, far below Holland, and far below the despised Hun. If you were to inquire to-day what it is that has made the German Army so powerful, has made it possible for Germany to mobilize her forces of brain and money and metal and men, the answer that would come from every informed man would be that the basis of that great power is to be found in Germany's wonderful educational system. I am only sorry that they have not turned it to a better purpose. It was said long ago by a celebrated man, "Knowledge is power." If all the people of the United States had been privileged to have high-school educations and a large percentage had obtained college educations, our country would have been the gainer.

Mr. President, if it be true that education is a good investment, then somebody has to pay for that investment, and that somebody is the taxpayer; and it does not make much difference to the taxpayer whether he pays the taxes for education into the township or into the city or into the county or into the State school fund or whether he shall pay them into a national school fund. In the long run it all comes out of the same pocket. If, therefore, education is a good investment, and if the Federal Government shall pay for that education out of the pockets of the taxpayer, the taxpayer will in the long run be no poorer than if the education were paid for by the township or by the State or by the city. The only way in which the taxpayer could save any money would be by not educating the young men, and when you fail to educate the young men you do an utterly foolish and wasteful thing. From the economic standpoint you are as much in error as the man who refuses to plant wheat because the seed will cost him some money, even though it will bring a crop of a hundredfold.

Every dollar spent in education is a dollar invested that will bring back a thousandfold, and, as the taxpayer has to pay this money, what difference does it make whether it is paid to the Federal Government or paid to a local government? But the point is this: If we do not put this clause into this bill these young men may not be provided with an education by the State or by the county or by the township. Let us make sure the opportunity is not denied.

So much for the question of dollars and cents. I remark, in the second place, lest there should be some misapprehension, that it is not proposed in this bill that there shall be established governmental institutions to educate the youth. It is only proposed that we shall say to these boys whom we are now taking from the schools—the country school, the city school, the public school, or the university—that we shall say to them all alike, "That time which you shall give in saving and preserving your country, and which you shall lose from your school life, the Government will, as far as possible, enable you to recoup by placing within your reach an education in an approved educational institution."

Of course, that does not mean that the Government will create a special institution. It means no more than that the governmental authorities will approve certain classes and kinds of schools, will set up certain standards, and will say to the young men, "You shall have the privilege of attending these schools." Reasonable regulations will be made. I have no doubt but that arrangements will be made with every State university; I have no doubt but that arrangements will be made with the local high schools. Very likely provision will be made whereby, in appropriate cases, the country schools may be utilized. The details can not be put into a law, but regulations can be adopted that will enable the boys who come back from the front to obtain an education.

Somebody says: "They may want to take a postgraduate course." The only man who can take a postgraduate course is a man who has already graduated; and if a man has already graduated and then wants to take a postgraduate course so that he will fit himself for the higher plane of intellectual attainment, so much the better. Heaven knows we need more of that kind of men in our country. If the soldier boy returned to the vocations of peace shall want to fit himself for a great engineer, we shall have need of him; or shall want to become a great chemist, we shall have need of the chemist; or shall want to be a great mathematician, we shall need the mathematician; or shall have an ambition to be a great architect, we shall need that kind of talent; or shall want to attend an argicultural school and become more proficient in the art of farming, we shall benefit thereby. We need more talent of every kind; we can not have too much.

On the other hand, it is said that we may furnish high-school educations to boys who, if there had never been a war, might not have obtained a high-school education. If that is true, so much the more merit there is in this bill. If it shall transpire that we shall educate a million men who otherwise never would have had the benefit of a high-school education, or even a common-school education, so much the more reason for passing this bill.

Senators, you are taking these boys away from their homes at the very period when they would be finishing out their education. You are requiring I know not how much time—it may be three months, it may be six months, it may be six years—of their lives. You are tearing them away from their opportunities in life; and what is the position you have left them in? The boy above 21 has already secured his education. The boy who is now 15 or 16 will, in all probability, never be drafted, for the war will be over before he becomes 18 years of age. Accordingly, he will without interruption conclude his education; but the boy of 18 and of 19 and of 20 will find himself deprived of the opportunity to get an education. When this war is over he must go out in competition with men, both older and younger than he is, who have had the advantage of education.

All that is asked, then, is that the Government shall, as far as possible, take these boys who have jeopardized their lives under the command of the Government, in order to save and preserve it, and, as nearly as possible, place them back where they would have been if the Government had not torn them from their homes and from the places of learning where they had been pursuing their studies. And if in this war any of them who would not have gone to school had the war not come shall have acquired a thirst for learning, in the name of our country and in the name of civilization let us give them every opportunity, open to them every door, point to them every shining path of knowledge, and help to make them so much the better citizens.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I understand there is no amendment to the amendment pending. I am in very hearty accord with what has been said by the Senator from Missouri, and of course in favor of this amendment. As it stands it is merely a pledge—of course, a solemn pledge—to these boys themselves, to their friends and relatives, that they shall be given, at the cost of the Government, the privilege of securing two years of education of some kind. It is not self-enacting. The President is to adopt rules and regulations, and Congress would necessarily be compelled to make the appropriations to carry them out, and at that time the rules and regulations could be discussed, as to whether they were satisfactory or unsatisfactory, and could be approved or disapproved, as Congress might see fit.

On Saturday, however, I gave notice that I would offer an amendment, and I now offer it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is it an amendment to the pending amendment?

Mr. FALL. It is an amendment to the committee amendment. As I understand, there is no amendment proposed to the committee amendment now. I offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico offers an amendment to the committee amendment, which will be stated by the Secretary.

Mr. FALL. I may say, before the Secretary states it, that the amendment itself has been submitted to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs and to various members of the committee, and I understand there is no opposition to it from that source.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, paragraph 7, line 14, it is proposed to strike out the period and insert a comma, and add the following words:

And such person shall be entitled to the same rights under the homestead and other land and mineral entry laws, general or special, as those over 21 years of age now possess under said laws: Provided, That any requirements as to establishment of residence within a limited time shall be suspended as to entry by such person until six months after his discharge from military service.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, where does the Senator propose to have that inserted?

Mr. FALL. After line 14. I propose to strike out the period.

Mr. REED. At the end?

Mr. FALL. At the end of the body of the section, before the last two lines.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New Mexico a question. I have just heard the amendment read. With the purpose of it I am in hearty accord; but is there any way by which these soldiers could select or make a filing while they were in the Army?

Mr. FALL. There is no detail or regulation under which they shall act; but the amendment precedes the last two lines, and those two lines would be applicable to the entire section:

Rules and regulations for carrying out this provision shall be promulgated by the President.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator thinks that, under that provision, regulations could be made under which a soldier in France, for instance, if he desired to do so, could initiate his entry here?

Mr. FALL. Undoubtedly; and for that reason, if the Senator will notice, there is a provision that the requirement as to establishment of residence shall not apply to the soldier making the entry until six months after his discharge.

Mr. WEEKS obtained the floor.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will suggest to the Senator that a bill has passed the Senate of the United States permitting those of the age of 18 years, and under 21, to make locations of homestead entry, and it is now pending in the House of Representatives. I have just heard this amendment read, without close scrutiny; and I will ask wherein the amendment which the Senator offers deviates from that bill, or how it will enlarge the rights which are given under it?

Mr. FALL. If the Senator can state to me the provisions of the bill to which he refers as having passed the Senate, I can then differentiate.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It simply provides that those under the age of 21 and as low as 18 years of age shall have the same rights of locating under the present law as those of the age of 21. It simply extends the right to those under 21 years and as low as 18 years of age. Does this amendment enlarge that, or what is the distinction that is made, I should like to ask?

Mr. FALL. This is a broad, general proposition as to mineral-entry laws, as to the homestead, desert, and any special entry thrown open under any special law. I think if the Senator will examine——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state that the bill which I refer to as having passed the Senate applies only to homesteads.

Mr. FALL. This applies to all mineral entries, all land entries. Further than that, the law now with reference to homestead entries requires that after an application is made, as the Senator of course is well aware, the entryman must establish residence within six months. A man drafted or in France in the service of his country could not establish a residence. This provision suspends that requirement as to him in reference to establishing a residence.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. I wish to address a question to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. WEEKS. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. WALSH. My attention was attracted to the inquiry made by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES]. I suggest to the Senator from New Mexico that under the existing rules an application for a homestead entry must be verified within the land district in which the entry is made. I am apprehensive that that would exclude the right of the soldier overseas.

Mr. FALL. I think the suggestion which has been made would obviate the difficulty in the mind of the Senator. That is simply a rule or regulation; it is not the law, but a requirement.

Mr. WALSH. That is true.

Mr. FALL. In this bill the President is authorized to formulate such rules and regulations as will put the provision into effect. So undoubtedly he can suspend that rule or set it aside and create a new rule as to this particular class of entries.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WEEKS. I do.

Mr. REED. Would it not be agreeable to the Senator to offer his amendment as a separate amendment? I am for his amendment, but I do not want it to get mixed with this amendment, because it will go to conference, and I do not know what kind of opposition might arise. That is the only reason why I make the suggestion. I am perfectly agreeable to the amendment.

Mr. FALL. If I may trespass on the time of the Senator from Massachusetts to answer the suggestion, I have no objection to adopting the suggestion of the Senator. In that event it will be necessary, however, to change the wording of the other two lines on pages 15 and 16 and provide that rules and regulations for carrying out the above two provisions or the last above provision shall be promulgated by the President. I am perfectly willing to make a new section provided it is agreeable that we strike out, on line 15, the word "this" and insert the word "these."

Mr. WEEKS. It seems to me it would be desirable to make a separate proposition of that, and I hope the Senator will do so.

Mr. FALL. Then, Mr. President, I withdraw the amendment temporarily so that the section as it stands may be discussed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico temporarily withdraws his amendment to the amendment, and the Senator from Massachusetts will proceed.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I have risen to address myself to the merits of the amendment which is now before the Senate. I regret that owing to the lateness of my train this morning I was unable to be present at the committee meeting to make known to the committee my objections to this paragraph.

I am, of course, desirous that every man shall receive a suitable education, but it seems to me that this proposition is unnecessarily and unwisely paternalistic. We are going to have at least 2,000,000 men in the service who would come under this provision. Many of them may never see the other side. Many of them may serve a very short time. Many of them may not desire what would be termed an education under this bill, and I do not know what an education means because it simply says education. It might be a technical education; it might be a literary education; it might be a commercial education. It might mean a man should be trained as a mechanic. It might mean almost anything under the terms of this proposed proposition.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to ask the Senator's opinion as to whether it means free tuition only or whether it means that the Government should furnish board and lodging for the students. There is nothing in the amendment which indicates which one or the other of those plans is intended to be provided for. The amendment could be construed to mean free tuition; there is no doubt about that; but I doubt very much whether that is the intention of the framers of the amendment. It looks to me as though it ought to be somewhat more definite than it is, and, furthermore, as to what kind of school the young man is to be sent to. I should like to get the Senator's view as to the effect of the amendment. There are many of these boys who have not the qualifications for entering a college. Does it mean that they shall be sent to college under those circumstances or not sent to college?

Mr. WEEKS. It is my purpose to discuss the matter to which the Senator's question leads. I do not know what it means. If it means tuition, that is one thing, of course, that would very greatly limit the expenditure, but educating a man means very much more than providing his tuition. It means providing for his board. It means providing for his clothing. It means providing for his transportation going from his home to the educational institution and innumerable other things, as every father knows.

Now, of these 2,000,000 men—if we may roughtly estimate that there will be 2,000,000—nine-tenths of them have reached a period in life where they have passed from the common school to what they intend to make their life work or to go to some higher institution of learning. Not more than one-tenth of those 2,000,000 men would go to a college or university if they did not go into the Army. What are you going to do with the other nine-tenths, or are you going to educate those million eight hundred thousand men in a way which they had not contemplated or perhaps do not desire?

Moreover these young men are coming back from the service self-reliant persons. They are going to be trained men. I do not place any reliance whatever upon the argument made by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] on Saturday that their service in the Army is going to lessen the efficiency of those men. It is going to make better men of them. It is going to make more self-reliant men of them. It is going to make better trained men of them. If I had my choice as a business man I would give the greatest preference to the man who had had the training of this service in the war. It is going to be invaluable in that way.

I, Mr. President, would be in favor of anything that would really be of some benefit to any class of men if it did not reflect on some other class. We do not owe any more to the boys who are going into the service than to the men who are going into the service and leaving their families and leaving their business.

In fact, in my judgment they are better equipped for that service and will make better soldiers than the older men. If we are going to do things of this sort for men under 21 we should compensate in some way those men who are more than 21.

I do not believe there is any general demand for this. I do not believe the boys themselves if they had a vote on the subject would ask that they be compensated in any different way from those who are bearing the same burdens which they are bearing.

As I said in the beginning, I think this is unnecessary and unreasonable paternalism. Let us suppose we spend a thousand dollars on each one of these boys—on each one of those 2,000,000 boys—that is $2,000,000,000. Senators, we have got to stop and think pretty soon what we are doing with the money of the people of this country. We have got enormous bills to pay when this war is over. We can not in a haphazard, illogical, unthinking way go ahead and provide for the expenditure of billions of dollars without bringing down on ourselves condemnation, and just condemnation, from our constituents.

I want to have Congress think a little about the Treasury; I want it to think a little about the future; I want to consider about where we are going to get this money to pay these bills, and we are going to have enough of them without undertaking something which is unnecessary and which is illogical as well.

I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Johnson, S. Dak.	Penrose	Smoot
Baird	Jones, N. Mex.	Phelan	Sterling
Bankhead	Jones, Wash.	Pittman	Sutherland
Brandegee	Kellogg	Poindexter	Swanson
Chamberlain	Kendrick	Pomerene	Thomas
Colt	Kenyon	Ransdell	Townsend
Culberson	Lenroot	Reed	Trammell
Cummins	Lodge	Robinson	Underwood
Curtis	McCumber	Saulsbury	Vardaman
Dillingham	McKellar	Shafroth	Wadsworth
Fall	McNary	Sheppard	Walsh
Fernald	Martin	Sherman	Warren
France	Nelson	Shields	Watson
Frelinghuysen	New	Simmons	Weeks
Gerry	Norris	Smith, Ariz.	Wilfley
Gulon	Nugent	Smith, Ga.	Wolcott
Henderson	Overman	Smith, Md.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. WEEKS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I have not heard all that has been said in favor of this amendment—indeed, I have not had opportunity to study it—but from what I have heard briefly I take it that it provides that every soldier who shall have been accepted as a volunteer, or who has been drafted, may be educated at the expense of the Government after his return for a period equal to the time he served in the Army, not exceeding two years, and that regardless of whether the soldier is abundantly able to educate himself or not, if he sees fit to educate himself.

Mr. President, when the war is over the people of the United States will be called upon to meet the necessities of all the men and their dependents who served in the war as they should properly be met. They will be called upon to meet other now unknown great responsibilities. I think it is premature now for the Congress to enact such legislation as this, regardless of the conditions that may obtain later on. There is no one who doubts that this country is willing at all times to provide liberally and magnanimously for all the men and their dependents in case of need who offer themselves and whose services are accepted by the country at this time.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that we could well afford now to meet the necessities as they are presented to us. No one can yet foresee what this Government is going to be called upon to meet; what demands will arise. We are just now, and we will not be unjust either to our defenders or to the people in the future.

So, if I understand this correctly, and feeling, as I do, the greatest gratitude to the men who are offering to make the supreme sacrifice for our country, impressed as I am with that awful sacrifice, I still do not believe it is the part of wisdom on the part of Congress to take a step like this which it does not understand and which it can not properly understand until the war is over. If the exemption age in the draft is to be reduced to 18 years, I could look with greater favor upon the application of this amendment to men who enlist at the ages of 18, 19, and 20. But I feel that it is a mistake to take this action now.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it seems to me that the objections raised to this amendment are altogether unsound. First, it is said it may apply to some soldiers who would not go to school if the Government does not furnish the educational facilities. That might be said of every public school in the United States, for a large per cent of the people would not be able to attend school if the States did not furnish free schools. I am astonished to find the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] arguing that we are rushing into paternalism when we provide that the United States shall furnish an education free. I am more astonished when I reflect that the glory of Massachusetts is to-day and always has been that from the very first she established free public schools for her people. Nobody regards that paternalism. The Senator from Massachusetts can not mean to say that if the State furnishes a free education to the citizen the State is engaged in a policy of paternalism.

Mr. WEEKS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. WEEKS. I would like to call the attention of the Senator to this: Presumably every one of these young men has had the benefit of the public-school system, and the education he would receive thereafter would be in higher institutions of learning, for which the State of Massachusetts and, I think, other States do not make any provision, except those that have State universities.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, how does that alter the case? If it is paternalism to teach a boy geometry in a college, it is paternalism to teach him long division in a country school. The question whether free public schools are paternalistic or not does not depend on the degree or character of the education imparted; it depends upon the fact that the Government is furnishing opportunity of education to the citizen.

Mr. President, when Massachusetts started out with her wonderful plan of educating the youth I apprehend the education was quite limited. As the years have gone on she has extended the scope of her educational institutions until to-day, I doubt not, nearly every boy in Massachusetts has an opportunity to secure an education in a high school that is the equivalent of the best university education that could have been acquired in the country a hundred and fifty years ago.

The argument of the distinguished Senator is for once unsound. There is nothing paternalistic about the State educating the citizen.

As is well suggested by the distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN], the State does not educate the citizen for the benefit of the citizen. The State educates the citizen for the benefit of the State, realizing that a population of ignoramuses makes a State that is unsafe; particularly is this true if the State be a republic. A population of intelligent people makes a State that is safe. Education also multiplies and magnifies the power of every man who has had the benefit thereof.

Neither is there anything sound in the objection that somebody may want this education who has money and can afford to educate himself. To begin with, there are not many such people. In the second place, if there were, and if the Government actually did pay out some money to educate them, would the country be thereby a loser? Except for one thing I would be entirely willing to have the bill so amended that it would not apply to the rich, who can well afford to pay for an education.

I will, however, oppose such an amendment, because I do not propose to require the boys who have imperiled their lives upon the field of battle to make pauper affidavits in order to get an education. I do not want a line drawn between those who have little money and those who have much wealth. I do not want the benefits of this bill to be offered to the soldiers as a miserable dole that is to be granted on condition of impecuniosity, pleaded and proven. I do not want the boys from the Senator's splendid State who have gone to the war and who have lost the opportunity of completing their education put to the test of making an affidavit that they are paupers before they can have an opportunity under this bill to attend school. I would rather even pay for the education of a few chaps who can afford to pay their own way. If they are very wealthy we will probably get them by the income tax after the war is over anyhow, and make them contribute in that way.

There is another argument which I can not indorse. It is that when this war is over we will have many bills to pay. Mr. President, we will have many bills to pay; there will be a great burden upon the wealth and labor of the country; but are we going to begin our economies by denying the chance of an education to the men who shall have saved the country and preserved Christian civilization? Are we going to put money in our purses by impoverishing the intellectual opportunity of the lads we are taking to-day in their teens and putting on the battle line?

You ask why this amendment should be restricted to these boys in their teens. I explained that an hour ago, but I am glad to repeat what I have already said. The man of 21 in nearly every instance has completed his education. The boy who is now 15 and 16 years of age will probably never have to go into the Army at all. We all hope so. Hence he will go on with his education without interruption. The men who will be taken from their schools and their opportunity of education at the very crucial and formative period of their lives and at the beginning of their career will be the lads of 18, 19, and 20 we are now drafting.

There will not be enough boys left in the universities of this country to count; there will be very great inroads made into the high schools of the country; there will be inroads made into the advanced country schools amongst the boys who have not had much chance to push along but who are still trying to finish their education. All that is proposed by the amendment is that the boy shall be given an opportunity to attend school for as long a period as he has served his country upon the bloody field of war, provided the period of such schooling shall not exceed two years. Yet, sir, when a question of that kind is presented men stand and count their sheckels.

I repeat what I said a few moments ago, every dollar invested in the brains of these boys is a dollar that will grow and that will repay the country a thousandfold.

Neither is there merit in the argument that we do not know to whom the law will apply and when it will apply. It is provided that these schools shall be "approved" schools. That, of course, means that the established and reputable schools of the country generally will be employed. The questions how will the kind of education be determined and how much will be allowed to be expended and all similar queries are answered by the clause which provides that—

Rules and regulations for carrying out this provision shall be promulgated by the President.

Are we afraid to trust him with it? There may be many criticisms upon Woodrow Wilson. It may be said that he is not a great warrior, for he has never studied the art of war, but, nevertheless, he is the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. It may be said that he does not know how to run the farms of the country, because he is not an agriculturist, and so on. But there is one thing that you can not say with truth about Woodrow Wilson, and that is that he does not understand questions of education and educational institutions.

In that he is an undoubted expert—one of the greatest in the world. If he shall be the President of the United States when this war is over, I think he will know how to make the simple rules and regulations to carry out the provisions of my amendment. If he is not then the President of the United States, I am sure we shall have somebody as President who will have sense enough and patriotism enough and decency enough to make proper rules under which these soldier boys can obtain an education in accordance with the spirit of this bill.

Mr. PHELAN. May I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. PHELAN. As a member of the Military Affairs Committee, what does the Senator understand education at the expense of the United States Government to include?

Mr. REED. Well, I will undertake to say that reasonable rules and regulations will be made, so that extravagance can not be indulged. It will naturally be provided, let me say, if it is a question of a college, that a boy shall be privileged to attend his State college or some certain kind of institution and that a stipend of a certain amount will be allowed him to cover the moderate expenses of school attendance.

Mr. PHELAN. Including expenses?

Mr. REED. Yes, sir; I think it would include that, for if it would not include that it would not be of any very great benefit. I really want these young men to come back and to go to school; I really want these boys who have had no chance of an education to obtain an education. I think if the Government expended four hundred or five hundred dollars a year apiece for a couple of years on these boys that they would go out into the country able to produce more of wealth for the rest of their lives and be of greater service to their country all the rest of their lives. Of course, reasonable rules and regulations in reference to the matter are to be made.

Mr. CUMMINS. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri a question in regard to the interpretation of the amendment. The first few lines read:

7. Any person under the age of 21 who shall have been accepted as a volunteer or who shall have been drafted and served in the Army or Navy shall be entitled, at the conclusion of the present war, to receive an education at the expense of the United States Government at approved educational institutions.

I shall take the case of a young man of 19 who has entered the Army and served faithfully but who is more than 21 years of age when the war ends. As I read the amendment, he would not be entitled to any of the privileges of the amendment.

Mr. REED. That was not my intention, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. I suggest that to the Senator from Missouri, because it would evidently create a discrimination which he did not intend and which would not be fair.

Mr. REED. Well, the Senator from Iowa possesses a very acute mind, and I have very seldom seen a bill drawn in which he could not discover some defect. I say this now with all respect and kindness.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator from Missouri want it to be right or wrong?

Mr. REED. I want it to be right, and I thank the Senator for his suggestion; but there was no intention or thought of the construction the Senator now has in mind. I am perfectly willing, if the Senator will suggest an amendment, to accept it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am merely bringing the matter to the attention of the Senator from Missouri and asking him if the language does not bear that construction.

Mr. REED. I have not thought so; but I am willing to modify it by saying "at the time he entered the service and under the age of 21."

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I think there is a good deal of force in the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], but I confess I have not observed the phraseology to be susceptible of the construction to which he fears it may be subjected. I would suggest to the Senator from Missouri to strike out the words "under the age of 21," in the first line of the section, and then, after the word "Navy," in line 5, to insert "while under the age of 21," so that it will read.

Any person who shall have been accepted as a volunteer or who shall have been drafted and served in the Army or Navy while under the age of 21 shall be entitled—

And so forth.

Mr. REED. I am willing to accept that suggestion. It is entirely agreeable to me, and I am much obliged to the Senator from Iowa for thinking of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is now on the committee amendment as amended, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] to the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and, therefore, withhold my vote.

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] to the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and vote "yea."

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] to the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GERRY. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] and vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH. My colleague [Mr. MYERS] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN]. If present, my colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. PENROSE. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. Not having been informed as to how that Senator would vote if present, I refrain from voting.

Mr. PHELAN. I wish to announce that the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] is detained on official business.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS]; and

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SHERMAN. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON], but this being a committee amendment, I feel at liberty to vote, and I vote "yea."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], but I inadvertently voted. I transfer that pair to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BENET] and will allow my vote to stand.

The result was announced—yeas 53, nays 13, as follows:

So the committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN obtained the floor.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Oregon that the word "privilege," in section 7, page 6, line 11, is misspelled, and should be corrected. The letter "d" should be eliminated from the word as there printed.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There is no objection to that amendment, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, at this stage of the discussion I desire to say that this morning at 10 o'clock the Military Affairs Committee secured a print of House bill 12731, known as the man-power bill, as it passed the other House, immediately took it up for consideration and had it printed, after having agreed upon the report which should be made to the Senate. I now report the bill to the Senate with an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to receiving the report from the Committee on Military Affairs now made by the Senator from Oregon? There being no objection, the Secretary will report the bill by title.

The SECRETARY. On behalf of the Committee on Military Affairs, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN reports the bill (H. R. 12731) amending the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I rise to ask the Senator from Oregon whether he now proposes to proceed with the consideration of the House bill or to continue with the bill under consideration?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am going to ask that the House bill as reported be substituted for the Senate bill which we have been discussing. The amendments which we have been discussing this morning to Senate bill 4856 are contained in House bill 12731 as now reported to the Senate, so that the discussion has not been in vain. Mr. President, I think the proper proceeding would be to substitute the bill just reported for the Senate bill on the calendar, so that we may proceed to discuss the House bill as it has been reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon make that motion?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 12731.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator that he ask unanimous consent to do that. A motion would probably make the pending bill the unfinished business.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Very well; I ask unanimous consent that the House bill be substituted for the Senate bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent that House bill 12731 be substituted for the pending unfinished business.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think the Senator from Oregon asked that it be substituted for the unfinished business.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. As I understand, the Senator from Oregon asked that we now proceed to the consideration of the House bill instead of the Senate bill, not that we commit ourselves to the exact form of the substitute.

Mr. NORRIS. That is all he asked.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is all I ask.

Mr. NORRIS. The pending measure is not the unfinished business, as I understand. The unfinished business has been temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon inform me if I correctly understand the situation? Does the House bill which he has asked be substituted for the Senate bill, and which he has just reported from his committee with certain amendments, conform to the action of the Senate up to this time?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir; in the main.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then I have no objection.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Every provision that we have discussed in the Senate bill is included substantially in the House bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The action of the Senate upon the various amendments is incorporated in the House bill?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, that order will be entered.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I say that the House bill has been printed with the amendments which the committee made to it and is ready to be placed on the desks of Senators. There is one amendment in the bill known as the "work or fight" provision which was not included in the House bill, but which the Senate committee has put in the bill now by way of amendment. No discussion has been had on that, and I presume the Senator from Iowa intends now to propose an amendment to it. There was one other amendment put on the bill by the Senate committee which is not in the Senate bill, I will say to the Senator from Connecticut. I refer to an amendment in regard to the purchase, at cost, of uniforms for officers in the Army.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I have a copy of that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator will pardon the Chair, the Senator from Iowa obtained the floor.

Mr. CUMMINS. I rose to offer an amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will ask the Senator to allow us to perfect the bill as reported. There has been an amendment left out. Will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, as the Senator from Oregon has stated, one additional amendment was adopted by the Committee on Military Affairs which is not in the bill as printed, the amendment having been lost before the bill went to the printer or having been lost on the way to the printer. I hold it in my hand, and I wish to send it to the Secretary's desk to be read. It is known as the Jones amendment to the last Army appropriation bill. I offered it in the Committee on Military Affairs, and I wish to say that I took it from the appropriation bill as it was adopted by the Senate. It was placed in the appropriation bill on the motion of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES]; and I wish to give him full credit for having presented it at that time. I presented it to the Committee on Military Affairs; it was unanimously approved by the Committee on Military Affairs and is a part of this report, although, as stated by the chairman, not in the printed bill. I will be glad to have it read and added as a part of the report of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. At the bottom of page 12 it is proposed to insert a new paragraph as follows:

All uniforms, accouterments, and equipment required for any officer of the military or naval forces of the United States shall be furnished and issued to such officers by the Government at cost price, under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, and the same shall be similar in quality and price for all officers of the same rank.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I simply wish to say that I am glad the committee has acted as a committee on this proposition. It has passed the Senate three times, and we have never yet been able to have presented to the Senate any good reason why it should not be made a law.

I merely wish to add that it was brought out some little time ago, in fact, I had it printed in the RECORD myself, that an order had been issued by the War Department with reference to furnishing clothing for the making of uniforms for officers in the various training camps. I do not doubt that that order has been issued, but apparently it has not been made known in the different camps. I saw a young officer in the city a few days ago who had recently obtained a commission and purchased a uniform. I took the liberty of asking him if he got it under the order of the War Department to which I have referred, but he knew nothing of the order, had not heard anything about it, and had purchased his uniform at a private establishment, having to pay over $80 for just a coat and two pairs of trousers. This shows, Mr. President, that we need some legislative action along this line, and I am very glad that the committee has acted as a committee upon the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield to me for a few moments to supplement what has been said by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES]?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Government commandeers a large part of the goods of character needed for officers' equipment, which clearly interferes with the private sale of such goods. The work of the Government could well be extended a little further to provide for the officers. I know that the present system works a great hardship on officers. I know that the prices they pay are 50 per cent more than they should be required to pay, and that retail merchants in the neighborhood of camps have found it extremely difficult to get the goods at all.

I am but just back from a camp in which there are 40,000 men, and while I was there several young privates from the Western States who had gone into officers' training schools successfully completed their course and obtained commissions as second lieutenants. A number of them had nothing with which to purchase their uniforms, and were scarcely able to buy the equipment. One young man from a Western State, just a little past 21, had no one on whom to draw to make the purchase, and he finally paid half price for the private's suit he had worn, went to town and had an officer's stripes put on his private's suit. That was the only way he could equip himself with an officer's uniform. I am sure he will make no less efficient officer because his suit was worn and plain.

How fair it would be for the Government to keep these suits on hand for the officers, especially the young officers, and, under proper regulations, to furnish them at cost and allow the young man without funds one or two months in which to pay for his equipment. It has been a hardship upon many of the young men heretofore, and it is perhaps even a greater hardship now.

The reasons are so conclusive, it seems to me, in favor of the adoption of such a provision that I can not understand where objection can come from. Our committee asked Gen. March, our very able Chief of Staff, what his views were upon the subject. He expressed himself warmly in favor of the Government furnishing at cost uniforms to officers, and also in favor of a uniform uniform for officers of each grade. I thank the Senator from Iowa for yielding to me, and hope the amendment will become a law as part of this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. I offer the following amendment and suggest to the Secretary that it is to be inserted, if adopted, after the word "draft," in line 12, on page 8 of the bill now under consideration.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. What became of the amendment which was offered by the Senator from Georgia?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa had the floor and resumed the discussion, so the Chair did not complete putting the question on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, because it was evident that the Senator from Iowa had claimed the floor to resume his discussion.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, if there is any way by which that amendment can be disposed of, I am entirely willing that it shall be done.

Mr. JONES of Washington. As I understand, the Senator from Iowa is willing to have the amendment voted on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from Iowa will permit, the Chair will put the question on the amendment suggested by the Senator from Georgia. The question is on agreeing to that amendment to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, before that amendment is finally acted upon, if I can have the attention of the Senator from Georgia, I wish to ask him a question. The amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia, as I recall its wording, applies simply to the Army and the Navy. The question has once before been raised here as to whether the Marine Corps should be specified. It has been stated that the word "Navy" includes the Marine Corps, and I myself had supposed that to be the case, but I do not think there ought to be any doubt about it. I notice on page 3 of the new print of the House bill, in line 13, are found the words "officers and enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps." I think there should be uniformity as to those terms of the bill, because an inference might be drawn adverse to the Marine Corps, which is just as much entitled to consideration as the Navy proper, if that be an appropriate expression. I do not ask for any action upon the suggestion now, but I want to call it to the attention of the Senator from Georgia, so that later on in the day he may perfect the amendment in detail.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. My understanding has always been that the term "Navy" includes the Marine Corps. If it does not, we ought to add the specific words.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I agree entirely with the Senator; and if it does, then we should strike out the words "and Marine Corps," in line 13, page 9.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not yield to this general discussion of the Marine Corps.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I beg pardon, Mr. President. The Presiding Officer had put the question on agreeing to the amendment. I was speaking on that amendment before it was finally decided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the committee amendment presented by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask that that be reserved for the present.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am perfectly willing that the words "and Marine Corps" shall be put in the amendment, and that it shall be considered as adopted.

Mr. POINDEXTER and Mr. POMERENE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. CUMMINS. Who desires me to yield?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I just wanted to ask a question of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I understood he was inquiring whether or not the word "Navy" includes the Marine Corps. Was that the question?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That was the question.

Mr. POINDEXTER. There is not any question about that. The Navy does include the Marine Corps. The Marine Corps is a part of the Naval Establishment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then why should there be special mention of the words "Marine Corps," as there is on page 9?

Mr. POINDEXTER. There is no need of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the committee amendment as proposed by the Senator from Georgia.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I now ask for the reading of the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 12, after the word "draft," it is proposed to insert the following:

This proviso shall not apply in the case of a strike if the strikers are willing to submit the dispute to the decision of the War Labor Board and agree to abide by the decision and do abide by it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have thought that I would take advantage of this opportunity to express some views I have not alone upon the immediate subject but to other kindred subjects involved in the bill.

The proviso to which this is a proposed amendment is as follows:

Provided, That when any person shall have been placed in a deferred or exempted class for any of the reasons in this paragraph set forth, he shall not be entitled to remain therein unless he shall in good faith continue, while physically able so to do, to work at and follow such occupation, employment, or business, and if he fails so to do he shall again become subject to the draft.

The amendment that I have proposed declares that this proviso shall not apply in the case of a strike if the strikers are willing to submit the dispute to the War Labor Board and agree to abide by its decision, and do abide by it.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion in that connection?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. It is not enough that they do all those things unless at that time they stop the strike. That is not included in the Senator's amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. I intended it to be included, and I shall be very glad if anyone will prepare such a change in the amendment as will conclusively reach that point. I supposed that was embraced in the thought of my amendment.

In discussing this amendment I ought also to consider another which I shall propose to the same proviso. I can consider them together, I think, very much better than separately.

The proviso which is ordinarily known as the Thomas amendment says that the classified person shall lose his deferred classification or exemption "unless he shall in good faith continue, while physically able so to do, to work at and follow such occupation, employment, or business." I shall propose to add after the word "business" the words "or some other productive occupation, employment, or business deemed necessary hereunder."

Mr. President, this amendment, together with the provision to which I seek to attach it, raises, as I believe, altogether the most important question involved in this bill aside from the enlargement of the draft age. In order to fully understand my view with regard to the subject I must be permitted to read another amendment which I intend to offer at the proper time, as follows:

The regulations relating to classification and exemption shall be so framed that there shall at all times be in civil employment a number of persons sufficient to produce enough to maintain, equip, and transport our military forces, support our civil population, and furnish to the countries cooperating with us in the war the supplies which their necessities demand; and all said regulations shall enforce, in so far as practicable, the duty of every qualified citizen either to labor in a useful way or to bear arms in the defense of his country.

The proposed amendments will, I think, disclose rather accurately and somewhat comprehensively the view I entertain with regard to the duty of this Government and its citizens at the present time. While I hope that the bill before us may be amended in some respects, I intend to vote for it, amended or unamended. I know, and have known for months—and I think that every intelligent person has known for months—that we must enlarge the draft age. We must bring within the control of the Government a greater number of the citizens of the United States from which selections can be made. I am one of those who believe, and believe firmly, that this war, before it reaches the only conclusion which will satisfy the intelligence and the patriotism of the United States and of the civilized world will require all our man power. Three months ago I had the honor to stand here and declare as my opinion that it was the duty of every able-bodied citizen of the United States either to work for his country or to fight in her defense. Time has simply strengthened the conviction I then held that the vast undertaking which we have assumed will involve and will require all our man power, either in civil or in military service.

I thought this ought to have been done a month and a half ago, and I did what little I could do, by way of amendments to the military bill, to bring about that result. It was not done. There was no reason for deferring it. There is nothing in this bill that was not fairly embraced in either the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] or the amendments which I suggested. I do not accept the explanation of the War Department or the administration as a sufficient reason for then opposing the adoption of those amendments; and when I propose a modification of the amendment suggested by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], and to which his name has been very properly attached, I want it distinctly understood that I am not seeking to destroy its efficiency.

I am not seeking to impair its strength. I am only seeking to do what I regard as justice between the Government and the men who may be affected by it, for I reiterate that I think that every able-bodied man in our whole country must either work for his country—not work blindly, not at unnecessary occupations, not merely according to his convenience or according to his pleasure, but usefully and productively—or, if he is not found ready and willing to engage in and continue such employment, he has no title to ask the Government of this country to exempt him from military service if he is physically and mentally fit for that service; and it is no discrimination against him to say: "Finding you in an employment that is neither necessary nor useful, or finding you idle, we ask you, and will require you, to bear arms for the country."

The difficulty, however, as I conceive it, with the amendment as it is reported by the committee is this: In the first place, if the person classified shall change his occupation, even though he is employed in just as useful and just as necessary a business or service, he loses his exemption or his deferred classification. I am sure that was not the intent of the Senator from Colorado or of the committee, and I can not but believe that they will on reflection accept the amendment which I have read, but which is not now pending, and which will continue the status of the man in the deferred classes if, in changing his employment, he has occupied himself in just as necessary and just as useful a business.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. FALL. If it will not embarrass the Senator in the line of his argument, I should like to call his attention to the fact and have his opinion upon the proposition that this so-called "work-or-fight" amendment does not pretend to apply to any of those persons within the draft except a certain classification. In other words, county and municipal officials, customhouse clerks, persons employed by the United States in the transmission of the mail, artificers and workmen employed in the armories, arsenals, and navy yards of the United States, and such other persons employed in the service of the United States as the President may designate, pilots and mariners actually employed in the sea service of any citizen or merchant within the United States are not covered by this proposition at all.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Iowa will permit me, the chairman of the committee has just called my attention to that defect in the pending amendment. I think it can be covered by substituting for the word "paragraph," in line 7 on page 8, the word "section."

Mr. FALL. If the Senator will permit me, that correction would not meet the objection, because you specifically confine your amendment to persons engaged in industries, occupations, or employments, including agriculture, found to be necessary. That is one of the classifications, and it occurs about the middle of the paragraph shown on page 4 of the original act.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; I have the act here.

Mr. FALL. If the Senator will examine it, he will find that so long as he retains the wording of the amendment as contained in the committee report——

Mr. THOMAS. But section 2 begins with the recital "that the provision wherever occurring in section 4 of said act * * * is amended to read as follows." Then the amendment provides that whenever a person shall have been placed in the deferred or exempted class "for any of the reasons in this paragraph set forth, he shall not be entitled to remain therein unless," and so forth. Now, if the word "section" be substituted for the word "paragraph," I think it will cover the matter.

Mr. FALL. I think the Senator will find another actual practice to exist. I am trespassing upon the time of the Senator from Iowa—but, under the practice, certain classifications here are treated practically as being exempt, and not simply in deferred classes.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have looked upon this proviso or suggestion as one referring entirely to a registered man who claims an exemption or claims deferment by reason of his employment, or the industry in which he is engaged. If that is not the proper interpretation of it, then it will fail, of course, of its purpose; but I have thought that that is the proper interpretation of it. However that may be, Mr. President, I am treating it and I am offering this amendment upon the basis that we are about to say to the country that if a drafted man claims an exemption on account of the character of the labor in which he is engaged, its usefulness or its necessity, and if he ceases that labor at any time, no matter if his cessation be of the briefest character, he loses that classification and becomes subject to the draft—that is, becomes subject to call among those who are first to be called into the military service.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator may have already pointed out what I am going to ask about. I was called out of the Chamber. Does his amendment or the amendment proposed by the committee add anything to the law as it now is, which reads as follows:

No exemption or exclusion shall continue when a cause therefore no longer exists?

It seems to me that when a man who has been exempt quits work his cause for exemption ceases.

Mr. CUMMINS. The answer to that question is found in the construction of the law as it was given to the committee by either Gen. Crowder or Gen. March.

Mr. THOMAS. By the Secretary of War.

Mr. CUMMINS. Or by the Secretary of War; I do not remember which one of them gave it. They do not apply that part of the law to unions in a concerted strike or a proposed strike at all.

Mr. JONES of Washington. How do they distinguish a man who quits work as one of a body of men from one who quits work individually?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not able to answer that question. I agree that under the law as it is the President has ample, full authority to accomplish the purpose which this amendment has in view; but he may or may not accomplish it, according to his discretion. The adoption of this amendment compels what otherwise would be an optionary upon the part of the administration.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. This amendment uses the word "shall," making it obligatory upon the President to make regulations. It provides that he shall make regulations to carry this provision into effect; but regulations have already been made to carry into effect the present law, and it is being carried into effect. The only difference, it seems to me, would be that as it is at present administered it is applied to individuals; each individual case is dealt with in accordance with its own merits. It does not seem to be applied to a collective body, which may involve a large number of men; but there is no reason why it should not be applied in that case, because they could deal with the men as individuals in the same way that they deal now with the individual instances.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Florida is undoubtedly right, so far as the view which has been taken of the former statute by the administration is concerned, but with the merit of that proposition, I have nothing to do at the present time. I am rising to propose and to explain and to advocate an amendment to it so that what might be called the withdrawal of discretion from the administration that is here proposed can not be used unfairly and unnecessarily to the injury of the men who are to be affected by it.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. FALL. Let me ask the Senator whether it is a matter of discretion at all. Where is the discretion given under the sentence read by the Senator from Washington? Is it not only the answer of the Secretary of War which the Senator from Iowa has just explained to us? It is not a question of discretion in him; it is simply a question of the executive officer charged with the enforcing of the law refusing to enforce it except in a certain way—not a discretionary question of construction of the statutes, but simply that he will not enforce it against certain people when he would enforce it against others.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the action of the interpreter of the statute, if he be an executive who is to enforce the statute, is final; and if he says that he will not enforce the law under certain conditions, or will not apply the law to certain conditions, that is an end of the matter, and the legislative branch of the Government can not correct it.

Mr. FALL. But, Mr. President, I do not understand that an executive officer of the Government is charged with the interpretation of the clear terms of a statute when his interpretation means his refusal to enforce the directory provision or command in the statute. The present statute provides:

No exemption or exclusion shall continue when a cause therefor no longer exists.

That leaves no discretion in the Secretary of War to refuse to inforce it against organized labor. His refusal is purely arbitrary.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am not quite prepared to admit the broad statement just made by the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. Of course that is my own statement.

Mr. CUMMINS. Possibly, I might approach that view, but I do not admit it in its fullness, for this reason: As I understand it, the Secretary of War or the administration is enforcing this rule against individuals, and what is desired is to enforce it against collective bodies of men who, for either a good reason or a poor reason, are about to strike or who have ceased employment in a certain way. The Secretary of War—and I am not at all prepared to say that there is not some foundation for his interpretation—reaches the conclusion that if these men have ceased employment for the purpose of securing fair and reasonable conditions under which to labor they will not during the period of their idleness, if you please, lose their deferred classification. I assume that this construction is induced by the thought that very soon there will be an inquiry into the causes of the controversy and that, as a body, they will again resume the work in which they have been engaged.

Now, I do not want to complicate or involve the merits of the amendment which I have proposed by any reflection or criticism upon the Secretary of War or upon the manner in which the law is being executed. I want the amendment I have offered to stand out free from any conflict with the present practice of the Government and to be judged upon its merits.

I repeat, I am not undertaking to present the merits or the demerits of the amendment recommended by the committee. It will be time enough for the Members of the Senate to consider that subject in its broad and comprehensive aspects after they have reached a decision with regard to the amendment which I propose.

I will state the difficulty with the amendment from my standpoint. I can not, of course, believe that the fear that I entertain has been present in the mind of the author of the amendment or of the committee, for if it had been I can not doubt that they would have guarded against the contingency just as I am trying to guard against it in the proposal I have made.

Mark you, here is a body of men who are not satisfied with the conditions under which they labor, a body of men who believe that they are not receiving the consideration from their employers which they ought to have. Their complaint may be one of conditions or it may be one of compensation; it matters not to me which it is. Under the amendment proposed these men must either abandon that employment and seek useful and necessary employment elsewhere or they must lose the privilege of being attached to a preferred or a deferred class. The very moment that these men cease to labor under a concerted arrangement, that moment they lose the advantage which the whole country supposed it was receiving, and the men as well, without hope of restoration. It is altogether too severe a penalty.

Do not forget I start out with the thought and the determined conviction that every man in the United States must either work, and not only work but he must work in a useful and productive way, a way that will help to maintain the war, or he must be ready to respond to the call of the Government for service in our military forces. I agree to that, and there is no man in the Senate who will enforce it more rigidly and who will advocate it more earnestly than I. But returning to the case I suggested a moment ago, a body of men, if this amendment passes, feel that their employer is enforcing harsh and rigorous and unfair and unjust conditions upon them. The employer knows when this amendment passes that when a protest among the employees reaches the point of a strike the employees will be confronted with the alternative of entering the military service. Of employers, some are good and others are bad; some are fair and others are unfair; some are decent and others are indecent, and this gives to every employer the opportunity to say to his men that you must either submit to my will with regard to the conditions of labor or with respect to the compensation for labor or you must enter the Army of the United States.

I want the Government to exercise this power of presenting alternatives. I am unwilling that selfishness, whether represented by the employer or the employee, shall exercise the alternative of civil employment or military service. It is contrary to our fundamental notions in the exercise of power to transfer this authority to any body of men, whether they be employers or employees.

So I have offered the amendment which has already been read. It is, and I think I can repeat it literally—this proviso—that is, the proviso which has been offered by the committee—shall not apply in the case of a strike if the strikers are willing to submit the dispute, whatever the dispute may be, to the War Labor Board, a board organized for the very purpose of investigating and determining disputes between employer and the employee during the period of the war.

But I am bound to say that at the present time it is not compulsory with anybody, employer or employee, to submit disputes to the War Labor Board, neither is it required of either side in the controversy to abide by the decision if the case is submitted and the decision made. It has nothing more than a moral jurisdiction. It has nothing more to sustain its findings and to enforce them than the general opinion of the community impressing itself upon those who are directly interested in the matter.

I want these men to continue at work unless they are transferred or called into some other field of labor; but it is not right, it is unfair, to say that if they quit work—and I am perfectly willing to say that they shall not quit work pending the submission to the War Labor Board—if they quit work, being willing to submit their dispute to the War Labor Board and being willing to abide by the decision of the board, that their deferred classification shall be affected.

I am not intruding or trespassing upon the ground which originally classified men. I am not satisfied at all with the classification of the men of this country, those who have been registered, and I intend to address the Senate upon that subject a little later in the consideration of this bill. I think it is all wrong, and necessarily wrong, because the administration, or Gen. Crowder, or whoever is responsible for it, did not anticipate and could not have anticipated the necessity for any such number of men in the field or in France or abroad as are now required. If Congress permits this bill to be passed without some direction for a reclassification based upon the necessity for six millions, instead of upon the necessity for a million and a half, it will neglect one of the most important duties confronting it, and it will, as I think, in, I will not say, a cowardly way, but in an indifferent way, have transferred the power to the administration which the Constitution requires shall be performed by Congress and which can not be performed by any other body of men so efficiently and so wisely as the men who are gathered together here, representing all the people of the United States. But that is entirely a different matter. I am now discussing simply the advisability of putting into the amendment proposed by the committee a fair and reasonable safeguard against an abuse of power which may well be anticipated.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], I think, in a colloquy with me on Saturday, or possibly the day before, suggested, and ordinarily there would be a vast amount of weight in the suggestion, that if in these days, when the demand for labor is so great that no one need be idle unless he desired to be, the protection I offered was hardly necessary. I think he fails to give due consideration to the difficulties in the transition from one employment to another. In nearly every great enterprise the men become skilled and efficient in the work of that enterprise, and it is nearly impossible for them to remove to some other community and enter some other employment. That ought not to be required. Efficiency forbids it. Our own regard for the necessity of doing things quickly and doing them greatly ought to preclude any such thought.

Mr. President, I do not know what the fate of the amendment proposed by the committee, of which the Senator from Colorado is the author, will be in the Senate. I know what it has been in the House, or I know what the fate of an amendment that bore some semblance, at least, to the proviso we are now considering was in the House, but if I gather the sentiment here with any accuracy at all, it will be necessary to modify it in some such way as I have proposed to give it any reasonable chance for adoption. I may be all wrong about it, but I hope the Senator from Colorado as well as every other member of the committee will look at the matter considerately. I want to help him crystallize something in the law that will enforce the maxim of "work or fight." I know that in order to do it we must be just and fair and give every man the privilege which justice demands.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] has called my attention to the paragraph where, in my opinion, it ought to be broadened at least so as not to confine it to those engaged in industrial work. The committee intended to cover everybody who was exempted for any reason, and I think it ought to be broadened so as to do that. But, assuming that the Senator's position is correct and the men are willing to abide the decision of the board, how long will it take to get a decision of the board? In other words, may not the men who have left their employment, under the terms of which they were exempted, stay out for a month or six months or a year, or no matter how long, to await a decision of the board?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think not. It may be that the amendment I have proposed ought to be changed slightly, although it seems to me that it is broad enough to cover the thought as it is. I do not want these men to quit work while the controversy is under investigation and before decision by the War Labor Board. I do not think they ought to quit work. I do not think the labor unions do quit work under those circumstances. If the Senator from Oregon can suggest any phraseology that will make that perfectly clear, I would be glad to accept it. All I want to prevent is handing over to the great corporations of the United States, the large employers of labor, a weapon which will enable them to strike down these workingmen without any relief whatsoever.

Give them a chance to submit their disputes to the Government and if they are not willing to abide by that decision then their immunity ought to be withdrawn or their exemptions should be withdrawn; but what if the employer does not submit the controversy to the United States, are you proposing to do anything with him? No; he goes free; he suffers no penalty. His position, with regard to the draft, is not changed in any fashion. Why do you not propose that if the employer tries to enforce unfair conditions upon his workingmen his taxes shall be doubled? In that way we might add something to our Treasury and furnish a very effective weapon to bring about justice.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator again?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Would not the power vested in the President to adopt rules and regulations for the enforcement of the statute enable him to do something with the employer as well as the statute enables him to deal with the employee?

Mr. CUMMINS. As said by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], he has that power now. I think he can exercise every power that the committee is seeking to bring into existence without one word of additional legislation. What the committee has proposed is a limitation upon the power of the President, not an extension of his power, and when you come to limit the power of the President and remove his discretion I want it done in a way that will enable the interpreters and the administrators of the law to render justice between man and man.

I never would have proposed any amendment of this sort, because I know that the President has the power to enforce the work-or-fight maxim, but the committee proposes to take away or to restrict that discretion and to exercise it for itself. When Congress comes to exercise it, I want to see it exercised fairly and intelligently.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will yield——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The committee report undertakes to limit it, so far as the employees are concerned, but does not include the employers.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.

Mr. McKELLAR. And that is the objection to it?

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.

Mr. McKELLAR. If we are going to deal with the employee, if we are going to restrict the President's control over him so far as the employee is concerned, then it seems to me it is manifestly the fair thing to do to adopt rules and regulations or direct by law the President to adopt rules and regulations as to the employer also. We ought not to deal with one side without dealing with the other. We ought to regulate both employer and employee if we regulate at all. I agree with what the Senator is saying entirely.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have attempted to lay before the Senate the reasons which moved me to offer this amendment. I do not know whether any part of the subject will receive the approval of the Senate or not, as I suggested a moment ago, but I am very sure that if we undertake to confine or prescribe the discretion of the President or the administration we ought to attach to the provision offered by the Senator from Colorado the limitations which I have proposed in my amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will permit me again, I will say to him that I am opposed absolutely to what is commonly known as the Thomas amendment as reported by the committee. I do not think that there is any necessity for it. There are no labor conditions in this country demanding it. I think the law now in force is ample and sufficient to cover the matter and that it is not necessary to have this additional legislation. I am opposed to the entire amendment, and I hope it will not be necessary to even modify it.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have taken occasion to acquaint the Senate with the reasons which actuated me in offering the pending amendment to the consideration of the Military Affairs Committee, and I had not expected to impose upon the patience of my colleagues by making any further statement upon the subject. Inasmuch, however, as the House has adopted a similar amendment and the Senator from Iowa has offered an important amendment to the amendment, supporting it in his usual luminous manner, and inasmuch as I know there is much opposition to the measure which may not entirely voice itself upon the floor, I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate for a few moments in referring to the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa.

I have no objection, Mr. President, to any amendment which may be needed to clarify without weakening my purpose. Indeed I shall welcome anything that will bring support to the proposition, because I am entirely of the opinion that unless some legislation of an enforceable character can be enacted concerning what I conceive to be a very serious defect in our course of military preparation this evil will increase instead of diminish.

Before I refer to the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa, let me say that I cordially agree with the proposition that the present law upon the subject as I read it is sufficient to meet existing conditions. My fault is not with the legislation already existing; it is with the construction placed upon it by the department and its method of enforcement.

If I understand the Secretary of War correctly, as I think I do, he construes this amendment as applying to individuals who are exempted and who then cease to work, but he does not apply it, to use his expression, to cessations in the aggregate. The Secretary of War is a most eminent lawyer and I respect his opinion very highly regarding any question or matter of legal construction. I am not, therefore, prepared to say that he is wrong, although personally I believe that his opinion can not be sustained. I am sure I never would have voted—well, I did not vote for the bill, but I never would have thought of voting for a proposition of that sort upon the theory that it would be applicable to the unit and not to the mass and that would be self-evidently discriminatory between the two.

I can not understand, Mr. President, upon what philosophy it can be said that a law of that kind applies to me if I see fit to quit work as an individual but does not apply to me if I see fit to quit work in conjunction with a dozen or fifteen or, if you please, a hundred or a thousand others. The principle is identical. Indeed, I am reminded of an incident that occurred during my years of practice up at Leadville, and which concerned the judge of our court, who desired to borrow a certain sum from a bank upon securities which he thought would be ample. He laid his case before every member of the directorate, and each of them assured him that there would be no trouble about the loan, but that the matter must be determined by the board of directors sitting as a committee on loans. When the committee met they carefully considered the application. They turned it down, then sent for the judge and acquainted him with the facts. "Very well," said the judge, "I accept your conclusion; of course, I have to, although I am disappointed; but before I leave let me say that individually you are courteous, accommodating, and agreeable gentlemen, but collectively you are the biggest bunch of liars in Leadville." [Laughter.] The application of that incident is in the reversal of the situation. Individually I become amenable to this law if I quit work, and therefore am within the ban of the law; but collectively, if I do the same thing, I am absolutely exempt. That seems to me to be a non sequitur. If that is the construction, and is to continue to be the construction placed upon existing law by the authority having the power to construe and to enforce it, then one of two things must follow: Either these cessations of work, this slackening of productive power, will continue in increasing measure or Congress must strengthen the hands of the administration by enacting further legislation upon the subject.

That is the only conclusion to which my mind can come. It is because of that situation that I have felt impelled to present this question to the consideration of the Senate in conjunction with this bill.

Mr. President, I affirm—and if I exaggerate I hope I shall be corrected—that never in the history of this country have there been so many strikes and suspensions of work for so little cause as have occurred since the United States entered into this war. I affirm that, notwithstanding wages have been higher than ever before—higher, indeed, than the imagination, perhaps, in its wildest flights ever dreamed of—while the need for work has been more insistent than it ever has been, and I hope ever will be again; while we have assumed the burden of raising soldiers by the millions and equipping our Navy by the hundreds of thousands, together with the added duty of supplying our allies with many of the necessaries of war and the necessaries of life, we are having constant and serious interruptions in our production. If that is true—and I believe it can not be gainsaid—then it must follow, Mr. President, that the one weak spot in America's armor to-day lies in our failure to carry on at home and to bring to the burden of this great war the energy, the effort, the patriotism, and the loyalty of every citizen of the Republic.

I do not believe, Mr. President, the duty of the soldier at the front is any more important to the solution of this great conflict than is the duty which rests upon the producer at home. I do not believe that, apart from the dangers involved in the one which are absent from the other, any distinction between the two exists; and yet we know that the man at the front is there because he has not the good fortune to be so equipped with knowledge in the production of a necessary article, in consequence of which those who possess that knowledge are permitted—not only permitted but are required, and ought to be required—to remain at home.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Colorado yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMITH of Michigan in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I should like to ask, taken as a whole, does not the Senator from Colorado think that the producers of this country have done remarkably well during this war?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly they have.

Mr. McKELLAR. Well, have not the industrial producers—and I am talking about the men who labor with their hands—done remarkably well all during this war?

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator means taken as a whole?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; taken as a whole.

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly they have.

Mr. McKELLAR. Well, is it not also true that such investigations as Congress has been compelled to make from time to time and the conditions which Congress has been compelled to investigate have all had to do with others than those who work in industries and who work on the farms of our land? If such is the case, why should we legislate along the lines proposed solely against those who are doing so well?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, Mr. President, the vast bulk of the people of the United States are law-abiding; take the Nation as a whole, it is law-abiding; yet we must enact laws against the commission of crimes, and we must make such laws universally applicable in order to be lawful. Such laws, however, must be made because of the nonlaw-abiding criminal elements in the country. The same is true of production. Conditions to which I am calling attention are not exclusively confined to the war. They existed before and they will probably continue to exist after the war shall have ended. I am concerned with production now.

The Senator from Tennessee calls my attention to the fact that our investigations during the war have been regarding other things than labor, and that is true. I have no doubt, Mr. President, however, that if we had also investigated labor conditions—and I think we ought to have investigated them—we should have found that they required congressional inspection quite as much as those matters which we have investigated.

Mr. President, I concede—and I conceded last week—that the production of the producing masses of the country during the war has been in excess of their production previously; but in a time like this that production is not enough unless it is the very best that can be done, for the Senator certainly can not, I believe, find a basis for a contention, if he should see fit to make it, that we are not sadly lacking in the production of many things, the quantity of which would have been much more than it is now but for these interruptions in the work of the factories, of the foundries, and of other institutions engaged in producing the things that are necessary for the waging of this war.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator from Colorado again yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. No, Mr. President, I do not take any such position as that; but I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that he has, as chairman of a subcommittee, just closed an investigation in reference to the production of aircraft in this country. As I recall, in that investigation and the facts developed from it, the trouble did not lie with the industrial workers, but with the employing classes. As I remember the distinguished Senator's report, its criticisms were not aimed at any of the industrial workers, but at those who employed the men engaged in the particular industry.

Now, it does seem to me, in all fairness, that if we are going to be called upon to pass additional legislation touching this matter, the Senator's amendment, in order to be fair, ought to include the employers as well as the employees. Whenever the Senator is willing to introduce an amendment which will create a just, fair, and honest board to pass upon labor disputes and will include within its provisions both the employers and the employees, I will gladly join with him in his effort along such lines, but until that kind of a proposition is submitted, I do not think that at present the labor conditions in this country are such that we ought to take away the only weapon that the man who toils has, and we all know it. Let us be fair to the laboring man. He has done a wonderful work in this war. Is it right to leave the employer out of the equation and at the same time give him a tremendous advantage over his employees?

I hope the Senator will not press his amendment to take that weapon away from the men against whom, as a class, there is less complaint than against any other class of our people, for there has been produced in this country since the war began more almost than the mind of man can conceive of. I hope the Senator from Colorado will not press his amendment against that class of our people.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am obliged to construe the Senator's last interruption as a speech and not a question.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is not a question. I admit that it is not. I hope it is answer to the proposal advanced in the Senator's amendment. I am not in favor of strikes during this war. They ought not to occur. But when we undertake to legislate on the question, I insist we ought to be absolutely fair to both sides.

Mr. THOMAS. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield?

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him merely long enough to put my proposed amendment in the form in which I want it?

Mr. THOMAS. Very good. I have written an amendment to it myself, which I had expected to offer a little later.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] suggested shortly after I rose that a man ought not to cease work pending a decision of the board. I think that is in the amendment as it is now framed, but in order to make it perfectly clear, I should like to insert, after the word "willing," the words "without ceasing to work," so that we may have the real question before us.

Mr. THOMAS. I had intended later on to call attention to a similar addition to the Senator's proposal.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. FALL. Would it interrupt the Senator now if I should read a proposed substitute for section 2 of the pending bill, and the amendments pending thereto, which I propose to offer, so that the whole subject may come up?

Mr. THOMAS. It would interrupt, but I shall be very glad to be interrupted.

Mr. FALL. Then, with the permission of the Senator, I will read the following amendment, which I intend to offer:

SEC. 2. That every man registered under the provisions of the draft act of May 18, 1917, or under acts amendatory thereof, and to be registered hereafter under the terms thereof and of this act, and every able-bodied man from 45 to 60 years of age, is hereby declared to be in the military service of the United States, except where heretofore or hereafter discharged from such service for physical disability or mental incompetence. The President is hereby authorized to classify all such registered men for combat and for other service, giving permits in his discretion to those engaged in industrial and other occupations to continue therein, or from time to time to change same, always being subject, however, to call for actual military service during the period of this war.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from Colorado will permit, the Chair will say that the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Mexico is offered as a substitute but not for present consideration. So it does not displace the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. FALL. My only object in trespassing upon the time of the Senator from Colorado was to have understood what the substitute would be, so that it might be discussed in connection with the original proposal.

Mr. THOMAS. It is true, Mr. President, that in conjunction with some of my colleagues I have been, in the discharge of my public duties, giving some attention to the condition of aircraft production in the country. It is also true that in the report made to the general Committee upon Military Affairs labor conditions are not referred to. The report was designed to call attention to the condition of the industry from the standpoint of production. I may say, however, that we found in many instances actually existing some seriously threatening labor conditions. There were a number of wage increases which were granted at different times, particularly, as I recall, in the Curtiss plant, which had to be made in order to keep the plant going; and while conditions may not have been so acute in these plants, due largely to the absence of orders and the impossibility of quantity production, they existed there, nevertheless.

My friend the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] is very much exercised regarding the exemption of employers from the operations of this amendment. Mr. President, I have been somewhat active for the last 35 or 40 years in contributing my mite toward improved labor conditions; I have never been classified as the champion of the employer, either in private or in public life; but I have always attempted, although perhaps I have failed most signally, in whatever position I have taken to do justice, as far as it was possible, to the employer when demanding better conditions for the employee. If it be true that the workman at present is in danger, or in the event of the enactment of this amendment he will be in danger, of exploitation by the employer, then I concede that this amendment is not broad enough; but, Mr. President, how is it possible—I asked the question last week—for the employer to become an exploiter of labor at a time when the demand for labor is so very largely in excess of the supply? I venture to say that there is not an employer to-day in the United States, although there may be some exceptions, who dares to do anything that looks like the exploitation of his employee. The employee would leave him in an instant, being almost certain to be employed elsewhere the next instant. When thousands of employers are beckoning to a comparatively small number of employees, the notion that the employee can be or will be exploited seems to me—and I say it with all due respect—an absurdity. I want to consider conditions as they are, not as they have been and not as they will be. I think much confusion of thought has arisen regarding the subject because of the failure to appreciate fully what our task is and what we must do to perform it.

The Senator from Tennessee talks about the right of strike. There is such a right, Mr. President, as there is a right to a free press, as there is a right to a man to produce all he can and sell it for all he can get, without interference by the Government, as there is a right upon the part of corporations to run their own lines of transportation, as there is a right to a man to consume all the food he pleases and to waste as much as he desires; but all these rights, Mr. President, are subordinate to the supreme needs of the Republic. I deny that there is any right, save perhaps the right of trial by jury and other absolutely fundamental rights, that can or should be permitted to exist during a period when the Nation is struggling for its very existence. Everything should and must give way under those circumstances.

We do not realize, because the war is 3,000 miles away, how gigantic and overwhelming is the task this Nation assumed when we entered into the war against Germany on the 6th day of April a year ago.

Why, Mr. President, the German Empire has been able to fight the world largely single-handed. Up to this time her conquests have been greater than those of any other nation. Her people have been trained in military science; all her industries have been developed for the sole purpose of dominating the world through conquest; she has been carrying out this policy quietly but persistently for two generations; and when, like a bolt from the blue, she plunged the nations of the world into war on the 1st of August, 1914, not a single one of her adversaries dreamed of the extent of her preparations and of the formidable character she would assume as an antagonist in a world struggle. She must be conquered if civilization is to endure and if the right to strike, among other rights, shall be preserved after this war shall have ended; she must be subdued, Mr. President, if your children and mine are to enjoy the priceless heritage established by our fathers immediately after the close of the Revolution; she must be subdued if there shall exist anything to make life attractive to a free people hereafter. It is for that purpose we are fighting; it is for that purpose that our children are being offered up upon the altar of bloody sacrifice; it is for that purpose that we have sent a million and a half of the flower of our manhood across the ocean to meet the Hun and overcome him; it is for that purpose, Mr. President, that we are about to take our young boys of 18 and 19 and add them to that mighty host, that the combined power of the great Republic may match itself quickly and decisively against the legions of the Kaiser.

We will begin to realize it, Mr. President, when our lists of casualties, instead of occupying a few columns, shall fill all the pages of our daily papers; we will begin to realize it through the tears of the widow and of the orphan, through broken hearts, yet proud because of the sacrifice that they have made for their country.

In the meantime at home we have an Army which has produced more than it has ever produced before, but which is not producing according to its best; and it is the best, and the best only, that can represent the highest effort that should be made at home.

Therefore, Mr. President, we exempt the employer as well as the employee; the superintendent and foreman as well as the man he supervises; and, for the same reason, my amendment is aimed as much at the employer who fails to do what is required of him as at the employee. When the employer fails in his duty, and particularly if he attempts to exploit the employee, this amendment will, and I think should, take care of him.

But, Mr. President, the great employer to-day is the Government of the United States. Uncle Sam employs more men than ever before; his army of workers is counted by the hundreds of thousands; and it is these employees who are striking and constantly demanding increasing wages and stopping work unless they get them, perhaps more, collectively speaking, than those of the private institutions of the country. Shall we include the Government of the United States as an employer in order to satisfy the objections of some Senators regarding the need for this legislation? I read on Saturday morning that the employees in the shipyards all over the country had united in a demand for an increase of wages from 75 cents to a dollar an hour, and would insist upon it. They have not gone out, and I hope they will not; but that means, Mr. President, in addition to the added millions of cost which we must pay, possibly the suspension of work in the production of the one thing that is more absolutely indispensable, if that be possible, than any other article that we are producing, and that is tonnage—ships.

The senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] has given great attention to that subject; he is perhaps better informed upon it than any Member of this body; and he has told us on more than one occasion what our needs are. We could not produce ships enough, Mr. President, if we were able to double our present working force, because we must remember that side by side with production there goeth destruction of tonnage; the submarine menace has not been overcome, and I am afraid it will not soon be overcome. Its ravages have been minimized, but it is still the scourge of the ocean. The one way to reduce that scourge to a minimum consists in the building of ships, and the building of ships, and the building of ships; and the man engaged in that work, and released from military duty because of his skill in it, who fails to give the best that there is in him to that great work is not doing justice to himself or to his country. The same is true of every other calling exhibiting the same conditions. They, together with us, owe a supreme duty to the tremendous fighting force we have across the sea. We must take care of them at all hazards, and as production slacks their possible exposure to disaster may become more and more a probability.

I confess, Mr. President, that these conditions interfere with my rest. I can not help but think of them; and it is because of these conditions that I have seen fit to suggest this solution of the situation.

Mr. President, the Secretary of War, as I have stated, has directed attention to the fact that the present law is enforced against the individual, but not against the aggregate. That reminds me of this incident, which occurred on Saturday, to which my attention was directed by the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD]: A fine, upstanding colored man by the name of Williston, a painter by trade, said that he applied to a shipping yard near Washington for work, and was denied work because he did not belong to the union. He then applied for admission to the union, and was denied because of his color. I do not know that this incident or similar ones have been called to the attention of the powers that be; but I say that the man who wants to work for the Government and help production now ought not to be barred for any reason, color or otherwise, but his services should be accepted, and accepted gladly. Neither should he be required to obtain employment from his own Government only through the agency of some private organization. We put colored men in the ranks, and we send them across the sea, and thus far they have given quite as good an account of themselves as their white associates. I take pleasure in calling attention to the fact that two negroes have received the cross of honor, and one of them a golden palm, as a sign of extraordinary bravery, across the green ribbon with which it is attached to his breast. These two men, Roberts and Johnson by name, held an exposed position, although assailed by 25 Germans; and while both of them were badly wounded, I think less than six Germans escaped uninjured. All of which goes to show, as Irving Cobb says, that you can not judge the color of a man's soul by the color of his skin. And yet here in the city of Washington, the Capital City of the Nation, a colored painter is unable to obtain work because, forsooth, he does not belong to the union, and can not join it on account of his color. Mr. President, this land of the free and home of the brave carries in its general practice some inconsistencies which had better be entirely suppressed until the war is over.

Now, Mr. President, I come to the two amendments offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. The first which I shall consider has reference to transferences from one place of employment to another. The object to be subserved by that amendment is a good one; but the great difficulty now is that men are transferring themselves from one employer to another so rapidly that they do not do much work at all.

I do not apply that statement universally. It is perhaps true here and there; but the demand for labor is so insistent that extraordinary temptations are offered to the employee, and he would be foolish—he would be something more or something less than human—if he did not yield to those temptations and seek a place where he could work for a better compensation. I should like to see those transferences stopped during the war, even though it might and probably would be said to interfere with the right of contract. But, as I say, in these times, Mr. President, these rights must be subordinated to the supreme welfare of the country.

This amendment is being opposed by united labor. I discussed their reasons quite fully the other day. I do not believe that they are tenable. I think that if they could be persuaded to look at this matter from the right standpoint they would see that, instead of being a reflection upon labor, it is a means to enable labor to carry out its patriotic resolutions of something like a year ago and at the same time minister to the general welfare. But this morning I received a telegram upon the subject from Pueblo, in my own State, which I will read:

> The adoption of your amendment by Congress for the conscription of labor will make splendid material for German propaganda in this country. We bitterly oppose your amendment.

Mr. President, I said once on this floor that during a somewhat variegated political career I had been accused of everything except corpulency. I am now accused of something that I never dreamed I could possibly be accused of since this war broke out, and that is "making splendid material for German propaganda." If this is German propaganda, then my construction of the term and my understanding of its objects and purposes have been sadly at fault. If work is to be suspended fitfully, yet constantly, and that condition is to continue to grow as it has grown, the need for German propaganda will be proportionately lessened in America. I know of nothing that more contributes to the German cause than American failure in industry, and I know of nothing that German propaganda has been more busily engaged in endeavoring to accomplish, and I greatly fear that it has in many instances succeeded.

Together with that telegram, Mr. President, I want, because it gives me pleasure to do so, to refer to a pledge signed by 5,000 employees of the arsenal at Frankford, near Philadelphia. Here is what they said:

> We promise under no conditions to strike or to encourage others to strike.
> We promise to lose no time in the performance of our duties or cause any delay in the fulfillment of the Government's orders, or do anything which for one moment would hamper the speedy progress of the war.
> We promise to live with economy and practice thrift.
> We promise to take no part in any propaganda which may affect the conduct of the war.
> We fraliy pledge ourselves to support the President of the United States in all his public acts.

Mr. President, what a splendid declaration that is, and how gladly I give it the tribute of my sincere and heartfelt thanks! I would to God that every organization in the United States would instantly fall into line and declare itself accordingly. It would be the greatest inspiration to our allies and the deadliest blow to German propaganda that could possibly be given by the great body of American workmen.

Mr. President, I say again that all that I want to do, all that I hope to do—and my interest is neither greater nor less than that of my colleagues on this floor—is to see to it that the man or men given the privilege of staying at home and exempted from military duty because of their superior efficiency in different lines of needed employment, shall do the same work, in the same way, and to the same extent, that their less fortunate neighbor is required to do in France and in the training camps of this country.

I think, therefore, Mr. President, that the amendment which I have discussed, offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], the purpose of which is commendable, is one which will serve to weaken instead of strengthen the amendment which I have offered.

The other amendment offered by the Senator is very much more important. A defect in the proposition was at once suggested by the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], and the Senator from Iowa has accepted the suggested change. At the time I was changing the amendment so that it would read as follows:

This proviso shall not apply in the case of a strike if the strikers will at once submit the dispute to the decision of a board to be designated by the President and agree to abide by the decision, and do abide by it, and will at once resume and continue work pending such decision.

Mr. President, thus amended, rather than jeopardize the adoption of this amendment, I would be disposed, as far as I am able to do so individually, to accept it, because if there be a tribunal at once chosen, and if the men who claim to have a grievance will at once agree to submit to and abide by their decision and will also continue work—that is the main essential—then we shall have taken a long step forward in our effort to secure the highest efficiency in the industrial affairs of this country during the war.

Mr. President, I hope that in my apprehensions regarding the consequences of the slacking or slowing down of production at home I may be overpessimistic. I hope that the apprehensions which I entertain may prove largely imaginary. But I believe that every man and woman in this country believing in the cause of America in this great war, and every one of them having a relative in the armies of the United States and at present doing his duty on the line and prepared, as Mr. Lincoln said, to give the highest test of devotion—all these are behind the spirit, at least, of this amendment. They want to see this work of war go on without diminution at home and without diminution at the front, so that the toiler and the soldier, representing, respectively, different aspects of our military strength, shall by their constant and their combined efforts bring this bloody war to a speedy termination and make the world hereafter a fit place to live in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, if there is going to be a vote on that amendment now, very well. I thought there would be some additional discussion, and I was about to submit to the Senate a proposition for a unanimous-consent agreement. I will submit it now. It will not retard the business of the Senate.

I propose the unanimous-consent agreement which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon proposes a unanimous-consent agreement, which will be read for the information of the Senate.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent that at not later than 3 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Tuesday, August 27, 1918, the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill, H. R. 12731, a bill amending the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that after the hour of 12 o'clock meridian on said calendar day no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 15 minutes upon the bill, or more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon any amendment offered thereto.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Oregon until what time he intends to ask the Senate to take a recess to-morrow?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Until 11 o'clock to-morrow, or earlier if Senators desire.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, at what hour does the agreement contemplate that we shall meet to-morrow?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It does not provide when we shall meet; but I will say to the Senator that I shall request that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock, when we do recess.

Mr. CUMMINS. The proposed agreement is that, beginning at 12 o'clock, the speeches shall be limited to 10 minutes each, and that after 2 o'clock there shall be no discussion?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will ask the Secretary to read the latter part of the proposed agreement again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again state the latter part of the proposed agreement.

The SECRETARY. And that after the hour of 12 o'clock meridian on said calendar day (Tuesday, August 27, 1918) no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 15 minutes upon the bill, or more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon any amendment offered thereto.

Mr. CUMMINS. Is there not a time fixed for beginning to vote?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Three o'clock is the time fixed by the proposed agreement.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is to be no discussion after 3 o'clock? Then I think we ought to meet at 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am willing to ask to take a recess until 10 o'clock; or I will make this suggestion: I will ask that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow, and fix the hour for voting at 4 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, why not make that a part of the unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I was going to ask to make that change.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon modify his request in the manner suggested?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; making the hour for the vote 4 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the proposed agreement as modified.

The SECRETARY. It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 4 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Tuesday, August 27, 1918, the Senate will proceed to vote without further debate——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I suggest, instead of 12 o'clock, that 1 o'clock be named as the hour when the time limit shall go into effect.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon modify the request in that manner—1 o'clock instead of 12 o'clock?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I should like to hear the agreement read as now modified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

The SECRETARY. It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 4 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Tuesday, August 27, 1918, the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill H. R. 12731, a bill amending the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that after the hour of 1 o'clock p. m. on said calendar day no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 15 minutes upon the bill, or more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon any amendment offered thereto.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Would the Senator be willing to add, at the end of the agreement "and at the conclusion of to-day's session the Senate shall take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning"?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think it would be well to put it in. My reason for proposing that unanimous-consent agreement is this: I assume that the general discussion has about been concluded, even on the amendments that have been offered, and that the time allotted will be amply sufficient to enable the Senators further to discuss the bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I understand that this unanimous-consent agreement will not interfere in any way with the unfinished business——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Oh, no.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Or the unanimous-consent agreement with reference to it; but I should like an expression from the Chair with reference to that proposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not hear the suggestion of the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wanted to know whether or not this unanimous-consent agreement would in any way interfere with the status of the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not understand that it would.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Very well.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, do I understand that there has been incorporated in the unanimous-consent agreement a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. When we do recess; yes.

Mr. PHELAN. There is some important committee business to be done to-morrow morning. I do not know why it should be disarranged, so I object to that feature of the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask, then, to strike that out, with the consent of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes; I consent to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request of the Senator from Oregon will be complied with. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Baird	Henderson	Nugent	Smith, Md.
Bankhead	Hitchcock	Overman	Smith, Mich.
Beckham	Johnson, Cal.	Penrose	Smoot
Brandegee	Johnson, S. Dak.	Phelan	Sterling
Chamberlain	Jones, Wash.	Pittman	Sutherland
Colt	Kellogg	Poindexter	Thomas
Culberson	Kendrick	Pomerene	Townsend
Cummins	Kenyon	Ransdell	Trammell
Curtis	Lenroot	Reed	Underwood
Dillingham	Lodge	Robinson	Vardaman
Fall	McCumber	Saulsbury	Wadsworth
Fletcher	McKellar	Shafroth	Walsh
France	McNary	Sheppard	Warren
Frelinghuysen	Martin	Sherman	Watson
Gerry	Nelson	Shields	Weeks
Gulon	New	Simmons	Willey
Hale	Norris	Smith, Ga.	Wolcott

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Oregon submits a proposed unanimous-consent agreement, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 4 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Tuesday, August 27, 1918, the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill H. R. 12731, a bill amending the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that after the hour of 1 o'clock p. m. on said calendar day no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 15 minutes upon the bill, or more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon any amendment offered thereto.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the adoption of the proposed unanimous-consent agreement? The Chair hears none and it is so ordered.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, unless some Senator is ready to proceed with the discussion now, I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, what is the request?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I say, if no Senator is ready to proceed with the discussion, I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CUMMINS. I should like to have a vote upon the question under discussion.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is no reason why we should consume to-morrow with a discussion of this matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon withdraw his request?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I withdraw it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment as amended may be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment as amended.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 12, after the word "draft," it is proposed to insert the following words:

This proviso shall not apply in the case of a strike if the strikers are willing, without ceasing to work, to submit the dispute to the decision of the War Labor Board and agree to abide by the decision, and do abide by it.

Mr. THOMAS. I suggest that after the last words, "abide by it," there be inserted the words "and continue to work pending the decision."

Mr. CUMMINS. I am entirely willing to accept that.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is already there.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The change suggested by the Senator from Colorado was made.

Mr. CUMMINS. I accept the addition of those words.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let the Secretary read it again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment again for the information of the Senate.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 12, after the word "draft," insert:

This proviso shall not apply in the case of a strike——

Mr. REED. Please read the whole text with the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. Section 2 reads as follows:

SEC. 2. That the provision wherever occurring in section 4 of said act, "persons engaged in industries, including agriculture, found to be necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment or the effective operation of the military forces or the maintenance of national interest during the emergency," be, and hereby is, amended to read as follows:

"Persons engaged in industries, occupations, or employments, including agriculture, found to be necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment or the effective operation of the military forces or the maintenance of national interest during the emergency: Provided, That when any person shall have been placed in a deferred or exempted class for any of the reasons in this paragraph set forth, he shall not be entitled to remain therein unless he shall in good faith continue, while physically able so to do, to work at and follow such occupation, employment, or business, and if he fails so to do he shall again become subject to the draft."

Then follows the proposed amendment:

This proviso shall not apply in the case of a strike if the strikers are willing, without ceasing to work, to submit the dispute to the decision of the War Labor Board and agree to abide by the decision, and do abide by it, and continue to work pending the decision.

Mr. TOWNSEND. May I ask the Senator how that changes the original proviso? It could not possibly affect them if they continue to work. That is what your bill provides. There is no possibility of their ever being affected by this proviso if they continue at their avocation. It seems to me it is useless to insert words of that kind.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I simply want to explain the vote that I shall cast on this matter. I am going to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, because I think it is a possible improvement on the amendment originally offered. I think both amendments entirely unnecessary and uncalled for, and if it is adopted I shall then vote against the amendment as amended.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I gave notice that I would offer a substitute for the amendment and amendments pending thereto. I will withhold the offering of the substitute until the disposition of the amendment itself and then I expect to offer it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I do not wish to prolong this discussion for a moment, if I can help it, but in all seriousness I should like to have the inquiry made by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] answered. The amendment as now read provides that it shall not apply to men who do not strike.

Mr. McKELLAR. Provided they do not strike, it does not apply. It involves an absurdity on its face.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I was waiting for an answer from the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. McKELLAR. I would be glad to hear from the Senator from Colorado myself.

Mr. THOMAS. It is not my amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Whoever is responsible for it, it seems to me, should explain it to the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am the one who offered the amendment, and it is rather a pertinent question, I agree. The intention is, of course, to provide for a proposed strike and to compel a submission of the dispute to the War Labor Board. The strike will occur or the application of the provision will be apparent after the War Labor Board makes its decision, and if then the employer does not abide by the decision the employees may strike without the penalty imposed by the Thomas proviso.

Mr. POINDEXTER and Mr. McKELLAR addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Washington. I think he rose first.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Suppose, pending the decision of the War Labor Board, they strike and quit work, and suppose they submit the controversy to the War Labor Board, and it would take the War Labor Board, say, a week or some other reasonable time to investigate the conditions and make a decision. Before the decision is rendered, while they are investigating, a strike is on. Would your amendment cover that case?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly. They are not protected at all at that time. The amendment has been rather "monkeyed with," if I may so term it, by the skillful Senator from Colorado and others, but the intention of the amendment is to provide this state of affairs: Here are men who propose to strike. Now, they are not permitted to strike without losing their place in the classification. They are willing to submit their dispute to the War Labor Board, and they are willing to agree to abide by the decision. They do abide by the decision. If, notwithstanding their willingness to abide by the decision, their employers still insist upon the conditions which have been condemned by the War Labor Board, then these men may strike without losing their places under any deferred classification. Now, that is what was intended.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will permit me, I will say to him that it does not seem to me that such a condition as he describes is provided for in the amendment. If the Senator will just listen for one moment to it he will see, I think, how impossible it will be for anything to be done under the amendment.

This proviso shall not apply in the case of a strike if the strikers are willing, without ceasing to work, to submit the dispute to the decision of the War Labor Board.

There can not be a strike without labor being discontinued, and therefore there is no condition to which the amendment would apply. In other words, it applies only to a strike. If the men do not cease work, then there is no strike, and the authority of the Labor Board can not possibly attach to the matter. I think the whole purpose that is in the mind of the Senator will be defeated if the amendment is adopted, and no good purpose can possibly come from it. I submit the amendment to the Senator. I am going to bring it over to him.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am perfectly familiar with it. I quite agree that the orderly arrangement has been disturbed by the change suggested by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am sure the Senator is right in that.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think, however, it has been disturbed sufficiently to destroy the operation of the amendment, and I am still of the opinion that it would have the interpretation I described a moment ago. But if there is any doubt about it, I am quite willing to adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Oregon and reframe it for to-morrow morning.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I make the suggestion that this whole trouble arose through the attempt to reconcile two suggestions—my suggestion and that of the Senator at the same time. My suggestion as first made would, I think, have relieved the proposed amendment of the suggested difficulty. It was this: That this proviso shall not apply in the case of a strike if the strikers will at once submit the dispute to the board to be designated, and so forth, and who shall then at once resume work. Then when the Senator offered his amendment to the amendment, and I asked him to incorporate a part of my own, it created the confusion. I think both the Senator and I are a little to blame.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not attempt to evade my responsibilty for some of the confusion. We will try to remove it by to-morrow morning.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Then, in view of the suggestion of the Senator, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator withhold that for a moment until I can make a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Surely.

Mr. FALL. I should like to know before to-morrow morning what the parliamentary situation is in the event the amendment of the Senator from Iowa is adopted to the committee amendment now under consideration. I have given notice of a substitute for the committee amendment as it stands and any amendment thereto. If the amendment of the Senator from Iowa is adopted, would my amendment then be in order?

Mr. FLETCHER. I suggest to the Senator that the proposed substitute be printed.

Mr. FALL. It has been sent to the desk, and will be printed. I simply want to know what the parliamentary situation is. It is a substitute for section 2 and all amendments thereto.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It has not been printed yet?

Mr. FALL. It has not, I presume. I will say to the Senate that I have no desire to have a vote on it now, but I want to know what the parliamentary situation is, whether it will be proper to offer it to-morrow morning in the event of the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair, having just resumed the chair, is not familiar with the legislative situation and recognizes the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. There is an amendment offered by the committee, and, of course, that amendment is open to perfecting amendments. You have the right, under our rules, to perfect a substitute and to perfect the original measure before taking a vote on the substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair, as at present advised, would hold that this amendment may be perfected.

Mr. FALL. Is my substitute in order now? I will make the inquiry in that way.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that we are dealing with the whole Senate provision as one amendment. If it were otherwise, then the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts would be correct, but it seems to me that this being one amendment we shall have to perfect it at this time before we can vote to substitute it.

Mr. LODGE. At the moment I spoke I had forgotten that we are dealing with a single amendment covering the entire bill. I think it is a very unfortunate parliamentary situation, because we are unable to deal with each amendment separately on each separate subject, as we ought. We have now a substitute pending for the entire House bill. You can perfect the substitute, you can perfect the House bill, and then you have got to take a vote on the entire substitute. It is very difficult to reach an amendment like that of the Senator from New Mexico, which is a substitute for one section of the substitute. I do not see how you are going to reach it or perfect it.

Mr. SMOOT. We ought to have perfected the Senate bill first and then offered it as a substitute for the House bill. I will say to the Senator he can reserve the right to offer the amendment when the bill reaches the Senate, but I do not clearly see how he can offer it even then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair suggests, in view of the disagreement of learned Members of the Senate on the question of the rule, that an answer to the parliamentary inquiry can be made as well to-morrow as this evening, and the Chair will consider the question carefully.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think we disagree. I made a misstatement because I had forgotten for the moment that we were dealing with the substitute for the House bill. If we had been dealing, as was the case nearly all day, with amendments to the Senate bill, then the statement I made would have been correct; but having offered a substitute for the entire bill alters the situation, and what I first said is not applicable. But I think the Chair will find on examination that we have a situation where you can only meet what it is desired to do—that is, deal with this paragraph separately—by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that the Senator from New Mexico has fully had his parliamentary inquiry answered, and we will to-morrow deal with the question.

Mr. FALL. The Senator from New Mexico is so thick-headed that he does not understand the answer yet.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks he does.

Mr. FALL. Then I should like to have the information from the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that the parliamentary situation is such that where the amendment is to strike out the whole bill after the enacting clause and insert a substitute, the proposed substitute the Senator desires to offer would not be in order if in the third degree. That is the present opinion of the Chair.

Mr. FALL. The amendment pending, which we have been discussing and upon which we are to vote to-morrow morning, is an amendment to one of the paragraphs of the proposed substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can, of course, offer an amendment to a paragraph of the proposed amendment, but he can not offer an amendment in the third degree.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I send to the desk and ask to have read and printed the following proposed substitute, which I shall offer to-morrow at the proper time.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska desires to have his amendment printed?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to have it read first and then printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Washington as soon as the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska has been read.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is a substitute for a part of page 8. I can not designate it any more closely.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided, That in all cases in which registrants are exempted or placed in deferred classification they shall become subject to reclassification whenever the course of exemption or deferred classification shall cease for any cause.

The President shall make regulations providing for appearance for reclassification and for enforcing the provision.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I understood the Chair to hold that the substitute offered by the Senator from New Mexico would not be in order on account of the amendment now pending being a substitute for the entire bill. I would like to ask the Chair if it will not be in order to move to strike out all the provision of the bill that has been discussed and to insert in place of it the substitute of the Senator from New Mexico?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is inclined to think that the question of the Senator from Washington should be answered in the affirmative, but the Chair would prefer to rule on the question when the amendment itself is presented.

Mr. FALL. Then the Chair, I understand, holds that whether the amendment of the Senator from Iowa is adopted or not it will be in order for me to move to strike out and insert.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is inclined to think so.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN and Mr. FRANCE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon was recognized and moved to proceed to the consideration of executive business but temporarily withdrew the motion. Of course the Senator from Oregon is entitled to the floor. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry, whether an amendment to what is known as the Cummins amendment is now in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At present it would not be. The Senator from Maryland may submit his amendment and have it printed and considered when in order.

Mr. FRANCE. I submit an amendment and ask that it may be read and printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 12, after the word "draft," it is proposed to add the following proviso:

Provided, That while any such person is so engaged in any employment or occupation, including agriculture, designated necessary or essential for the operation of the military forces or for the maintenance of the national interest, such person may be enrolled as though in the service of the United States and shall be entitled to wear some suitable badge, insignia, or uniform of such service.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I now renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, August 27, 1918, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, August 26, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We lift up our hearts in gratitude to Thee our Father in Heaven, for the splendid patriotism evidenced in the response of our young men to the call of the colors; for the great work of the good men and women who are putting forth their hands to make the task of our soldiers at home and abroad easier; for the safeguards our Government is throwing around them, especially in removing the temptation of strong drink, that they may be kept pure, strong, and efficient to do the mighty tasks laid upon them.

We thank Thee for the pure, patriotic men who are giving themselves to the task of furnishing the necessities to our soldiers. May the Government throw around them the same safeguards, that they may be kept pure and strong and efficient.

For all that is being done by soldier and civilian to win a victory for the world in an everlasting peace, continue, we beseech Thee, Thy blessings unto us and our allies; and all praise shall be Thine, in the name of Christ the Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, August 24, 1918, was read and approved.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. GILLETT rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Massachusetts rise?

Mr. GILLETT. I rise to ask unanimous consent that after the two speeches for which time has been given to-morrow morning, Mr. RODENBERG, of Illinois, be allowed to address the House for 45 minutes.

Mr. GARNER. On what subject?

Mr. GILLETT. It is a patriotic and political speech.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that to-morrow, after the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] concludes his speech, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG] be permitted to address the House for 45 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I rise to submit a few observations in the nature of a question of the privileges of the House.

DISPENSING WITH CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow me to submit a unanimous-consent request? I have a committee meeting waiting on me.

Mr. WALSH. Very well.

Mr. SIMS. I wish to ask unanimous consent that the business in order on Calendar Wednesday of this week be deferred until the following Calendar Wednesday and the water-power bill be taken up Wednesday morning and be the continuing order during the week. I feel absolutely sure that we will pass the water-power bill in that time, and I have been assured by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means that he will have no objection to this week being so used.

Now, it is very important that this bill in the amendment stage be considered continuously in Committee of the Whole for amendments and not be broken in upon continuously.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to inquire what are you going to do to-morrow?

Mr. SIMS. I was going to propose this: If there are any objections to dispensing with the business of Calendar Wednesday, that such business be in order to-morrow, and I will so modify my request, if it is desired; but I do not know of any business that it is desired to take up on Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. What the Chair is trying to find out is what is going to be done to-morrow if the gentleman from Tennessee does not go on with his water-power bill?

Mr. SIMS. I am perfectly willing to go on to-morrow, if there is an opportunity to do so. If Calendar Wednesday is set aside I will not go on to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the business in order on Calendar Wednesday for this coming Wednesday be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understood the gentleman from Tennessee was to couple with that request that the business that was to be done on Calendar Wednesday shall be done to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. No. That was not a part of his request.

Mr. SIMS. If there is no objection to that request the Water Power Committee can go on to-morrow.

Mr. RAKER. If the gentleman yields to general debate to-morrow, when the water-power bill could come up, and then ask to dispense with Calendar Wednesday, what is the reason why he did not object?

Mr. SIMS. These requests for time in which to address the House were made at a time when I did not know whether I would have the floor or not, and I did not feel like objecting when I did not know whether or not I would have the right to proceed with the water-power bill.

The SPEAKER. The status of the water-power bill is that it is a continuing order, of course, subject to certain exceptions. The gentleman from Tennessee now makes the request that the Calendar Wednesday business on Wednesday be dispensed with.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Tennessee if it is his intention to inform the House that the new revenue bill will not come up for consideration on any day this week? Has he been formally advised to that effect?

Mr. SIMS. I hope I am not saying anything that ought not to be said publicly, but I think I am safe in saying that it will not be taken up this week.

Mr. CRISP. I may say to the gentleman that in my opinion the revenue bill will not come up for a week from to-day.

Mr. RAKER. Will not the gentleman ask that the business in order on Calendar Wednesday be taken up to-morrow, and then take up the water-power bill?

Mr. SIMS. I intend to do that if there is objection to my request just made?

The SPEAKER. What request does the gentleman prefer?

Mr. SIMS. I will ask the Chair to put the request as I have made it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the business in order on Calendar Wednesday be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I want every Member of the House to take notice that as soon as these addresses, for which consent has been given, are delivered to-morrow, we will begin consideration of the water-power bill section by section and paragraph by paragraph for amendment, with the hope of getting the bill passed this week, and I beg of Members to attend the sessions and prevent points of no quorum being made and using much valuable time in calls of the House.

THE RECORD.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, in the daily RECORD of August 24 appears an extension of remarks by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], he having procured permission to extend his remarks on the day previous. The remarks convey to an anxious world information as to the returns at a recent primary held in Comanche County and various other communities in the great State of Texas. It is a personal exultation over a political victory; and in view of the shortage in print paper with which the Government is now confronted it seems to me that extensions such as this ought not to be passed by without comment.

My colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], upon the same date of the RECORD, under a leave to extend his remarks during the discussion of the water-power bill, has taken occasion to set forth extracts from speeches which he has made during the second session of the Sixty-fifth Congress. These are put in as one extension, but an extension not necessary, because under the rule, as I understand it, those extracts could have been reprinted in one pamphlet, they having been delivered upon the floor.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that I have come to be considered by many Members a good deal of a nuisance to this House in injecting my opposition to extensions of remarks, but I submit that under the existing circumstances, when the particular kind of paper that is used for printing the RECORD costs so much and is getting to be so scarce, there is a duty resting upon us as Members of this House not to take advantage of the House by our extensions of remarks and submit views on primary contests and other extraneous matters, and also to do everything we can to conserve the supply of print paper; and I wish to state that if abuses of the privilege continue, I shall feel constrained—accepting the full responsibility—to object whenever I am present to every single request for extension of remarks, whether it is legitimate or otherwise. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Texas rise?

Mr. BLANTON. In view of the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] I am going to ask unanimous consent of the House to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker and gentleman of the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] has intimated that I have taken advantage of this House in extending my remarks in the RECORD. With unanimous consent I secured permission to do so, and following that permission extended my remarks.

In a speech in Comanche, Tex., last August a former Member of this House saw fit not only to attack viciously the President of the United States but saw fit to attack the Secretary of the Treasury, accusing both the President and the Secretary of the Treasury of an attempt to bribe him while a Member of this House. Not only did he attack them, but he attacked every Member of this House and every Member of the body which sits at the opposite side of this Capitol, and he stated to the people of his district that when election day came they ought to take a club and club out of office the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury, and every Member of this body, and every Member of the Senate. He was speaking to a crowd estimated at 10,000 people assembled from many counties in that district.

I thought it was a matter of some importance to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] to know that on election day the people of that district frowned down in no uncertain way upon the kind of sentiments expressed in war time by a man who so recently had been a Member of this body, a man who had seen fit, in a crowd of 10,000 people, to make the attack which he did.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have two minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas may have two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. Without criticizing the gentleman at all, does he not think that the people of Texas have settled this matter, and that no further publicity of it is necessary?

Mr. BLANTON. I thought my colleagues would be interested in knowing the kind of punishment that the people of Texas saw fit to inflict upon a gentleman of that kind.

I will say that the gentleman to whom I refer not only saw fit to criticize public officials of this Nation but he criticized the food-conservation policies of this country and told the people of that country that they did not have to conserve food unless they wished to do so. He not only did that, but he saw fit to criticize the methods and policies by which we were attempting to finance the war. I thought that the people of this country would be interested in knowing that the people of Texas in his own county, in his home county of Comanche, had seen fit to give a majority of 1,100 against him in his home. [Applause.]

I did not take advantage of this House, and if the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] did not intend to move to strike the matter from the RECORD, I think he could well have afforded not to make the remarks he did on the floor at this time. I will of my own accord eliminate from the permanent RECORD the matter following the tabulation. I thank the House. [Applause.]

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes on this matter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, at the time the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] rose to ask recognition I was on my feet to call attention to this and other mistakes in unnecessarily padding the RECORD.

The Joint Committee on Printing at a meeting this morning authorized me to again call the attention of the House to these abuses of the publishing, if not of extraneous matter, of very much unnecessary matter in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The time has come when it seems that it may be necessary for the Government Printing Office to ask the President to commandeer the paper to get out the publications that we need. The prices of paper have gone so high that this one instance to which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] called attention, namely, the reprinting of a Member's speeches that had already appeared in the RECORD, to the extent of eight pages, will cost the Government of the United States, by the time the franking is done, $300. He might have taken these speeches out of the RECORD and had them reset for the purpose of having them reprinted for comparatively nothing instead of repeating the printing in the RECORD; but these things are done thoughtlessly and mistakenly by Members. Other Members, like the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], hesitate to object, because they do not like to criticize their friends. Yet matters of purely local concern, like that which has been referred to here of the quarrel in Texas, which nobody outside knows anything about, are extraneous. No doubt the politicians and people of Texas have read in their own papers of the condemnation of these utterances by voters. It simply burdens the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with a whole lot of matter that is very expensive to the Government and that very few, if any, people read. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD ought to be printed for the purpose of publishing the proceedings of Congress, and I believe it to be the duty of Members, including the Speaker himself, to see to it that every time a man asks to have his remarks extended, he state what he is going to print in the extension. Otherwise some will abuse the privilege and others, through mistake, incur unnecessary work and expense in the publication of the RECORD.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Does not the gentleman think that the practice of printing speeches made in different parts of the country in the RECORD ought to be stopped?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes; I do, and I think if the House would agree to let us take up the printing bill whereby the extension of remarks in the RECORD would be submitted to a committee for its approval before insertion in the RECORD, it would save a vast amount of RECORD space and expense of printing. The criticism of the country is that Congressmen are abusing the privilege.

Mr. FLOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman said that the reprinting of these speeches cost $300. Does not the Member have to pay for that?

Mr. BARNHART. The Member does not pay for putting it in the RECORD, but he does pay for having his speeches printed in pamphlets for circulation.

Mr. FLOOD. I understand this is the second time the speech has been printed.

Mr. BARNHART. This is a collection of remarks which have been printed heretofore in the RECORD and now reprinted.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Does not the gentleman think that a good deal of paper could be conserved by the suppression of the Official Bulletin?

Mr. BARNHART. That is a matter in the hands of the President of the United States. There is a widespread opinion that it could be reduced, and that if the information given out in the Official Bulletin could be given to the newspapers of the country it would be much more generally seen and read than it is in the Bulletin.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. If Congress wishes to adopt the policy to conserve, does not the gentleman think that the executive departments of the Government ought to lead in that?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes; but that is up to the Committee on Appropriations that controls the allowances to departments for printing purposes.

Mr. GOOD. I want to call attention to the fact that this morning every Member of the House received from the Fuel Administration about 10 sheets of paper, printed in two columns, containing news items. The first and second pages, I think, were complete, and after that some of the pages did not have more than 2 inches of printed matter, and then 10 inches of blank paper. All of the pages were printed only on one side. Every Member received this big bunch of paper containing but very little printed matter and a lot of paper that was absolutely wasted.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman from Iowa contend that because the executive departments are extravagant and wasteful, Congress is justified in following that course?

Mr. GOOD. Oh, no; but the executive departments ought to lead in these economies that it is attempting to have every one else practice. The extension of remarks are not the only things that appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that would appear to make it a waste of paper. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes on the subject of the condition of the Government Printing Office.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Reserving the right to object, I feel that I should give notice now that this talkfest has gone on long enough to the detriment of public business, and while I am not going to object to the request of the gentleman from Washington, I shall object to all other requests of that nature.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I am not a member of the Joint Committee on Printing, but I am a printer. I had occasion a night or two ago to visit the Government Printing Office, and I say to you that that great concern is in danger of being dangerously swamped. Conditions there are now badly congested, not only for the lack of paper but on account of the scarcity of help necessary to do the great amount of work pouring in, and not in any way avoidable by the competent chief and his able assistants and employees. The hearings of the Ways and Means Committee, a very important document, must be printed in great number. The questionnaires and all cards, forms, and documents in connection with the new draft are being printed. Army printing is heavy. This House should suspend as far as it can every line of printing that is unnecessary, and I would like to ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, for unanimous agreement that all requests for extension of remarks in the RECORD hitherto granted be this day suspended. I make that request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent that all requests for extension of remarks in the RECORD hitherto granted be now revoked.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I think that would be very unfair to the country and to Members who have been granted leave on these very important matters, and I object.

Mr. HILLIARD. I object.

MINIMUM WAGE BOARD FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering District legislation.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WALSH) there were 81 ayes and 2 noes.

So the motion was agreed to; accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 12098 "to protect the lives and health and morals of women and minor workers in the District of Columbia, and to establish a minimum-wage board, and define its powers and duties, and to provide for the fixing of minimum wages for such workers, and for other purposes," with Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee in the chair.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill H. R. 12098, which is the bill that was under consideration when the committee rose on last District day.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12098) to protect the lives and health and morals of women and minor workers in the District of Columbia, and to establish a minimum-wage board, and define its powers and duties, and to provide for the fixing of minimum wages for such workers, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending to section 2, offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, lines 7 and 8, strike out "Commissioners of the District of Columbia" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate," so that it will read:

"That there is hereby created a board to be known as the 'minimum wage board,' to be composed of three members to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

Mr. HILLIARD. Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will not be agreed to. It seems to be wholly unnecessary and is not in accord with the opinion of those who have this legislation in charge. The President has plenty of matters to engage his attention. This is wholly local, and we think that the local commissioners may with all propriety select the members of this board.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken; and on a division, demanded by Mr. WALSH, there were—ayes 5, noes 15.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That the first members appointed shall, within 20 days after their appointment, meet and organize the board by electing one of their number as chairman and by choosing a secretary, who shall not be a member of the board; and on or before the 10th day of January of each year thereafter the board shall elect a chairman and choose a secretary for the ensuing year. The chairman and the secretary shall each hold office until his successor is elected or chosen; but the board may at any time remove the secretary. The secretary shall perform such duties as may be prescribed and receive such salary, not in excess of $2,500 per annum; as may be fixed by the board. None of the members shall receive any salary as such. The board shall have power to employ agents and such other assistants as may be necessary for the proper performance of its duties: Provided, That until further authorization by Congress the sum which it may expend, including the salary of the secretary, shall not exceed the sum of $5,000.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Does this limitation upon the amount of money that this board may expend include also the amount which it will have to pay for quarters and rentals, or will they have quarters and rent free somewhere?

Mr. HILLIARD. Mr. Chairman, I am not advised as to whether they could have quarters free, but I imagine that is a detail which will be worked out without difficulty.

Mr. WALSH. Of course it is a detail, and it is a detail with which the committee ought to be somewhat familiar, because if the $5,000 is simply to be paid, $2,500 to the secretary and $2,500 for rent, at the prices which are being secured in the District now, they would not have very much money to operate upon. I was wondering whether the members of the committee felt, in view of the circumstances under which this bill was reported out along back last May, they might not need an additional allowance.

Mr. HILLIARD. I think it is entirely possible the board might find it would need more money, but those who are sponsors for the legislation are not disposed to ask for more money at this time, feeling they probably can get along.

Mr. WALSH. And that this would take care of their quarters and extra assistance?

Mr. HILLIARD. Yes; they feel that Congress is usually always open and other arrangements can be made if sufficient cause shall be presented.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That at any public hearing held by the board any person interested in the matter being investigated may appear and testify. Any member of the board shall have power to administer oaths and the board may require by subpœna the attendance and testimony of witnesses, the production of all books, registers, and other evidence relative to any matters under investigation, at any such public hearing or at any session of any conference held as hereinafter provided. In case of disobedience to a subpœna the board may invoke the aid of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia in requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of documentary evidence. In case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpœna the court may issue an order requiring appearance before the board, the production of documentary evidence, and the giving of evidence touching the matter in question, and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman in charge of the bill to the provision in this section in line 4 which provides that at any public hearing held by the board any person "interested in the matter being investigated" may appear and testify. I am directing my attention to the words "interested in the matter being investigated." Before a witness can appear and testify must be one of the parties in interest?

Mr. HILLIARD. I think the word "interested" is not so restricted in its meaning.

Mr. RAKER. If it is the contention of the committee that it would mean that at any public hearing held by the board any person may appear and testify——

Mr. HILLIARD. I think it is thought that the discretion of the board would be exercised within reasonable limitations.

Mr. RAKER. Is it intended that a person who is wholly and entirely disinterested, so far as the particular matter being investigated is concerned, but who knows of facts that would be of interest to the public and to the working people may go before the board and testify in regard to that matter?

Mr. HILLIARD. I think that one appearing and saying that he was interested would not be taken necessarily to be interested as a party, but the board by a few questions would be able to ascertain the fact whether he was interested, and if interested they would hear him reasonably, and if not interested they would know how to close the hearings.

Mr. RAKER. I still do not get the object of the committee. It seems to me that the purpose of this board is to obtain the testimony of all parties who may know anything that would be of interest to bring out the truth, so that a full and proper report might be made relative to the condition of labor and those interested.

Mr. HILLIARD. That seems to be a fair statement.

Mr. RAKER. But if it is intended that the persons who may testify must be interested in the matter being investigated, as the word is ordinarily used, then you confine it to those persons who have a direct interest in the employment. In other words, you are actually confining it to a man who employs labor or who is an employee himself.

Mr. HILLIARD. I think the matter is very clear, indeed, and yet I appreciate the difficulty under which the gentleman may labor.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from California yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman from California makes the point, as I understand it, that the phraseology used—"any person interested"—might be so interpreted by those in charge to include only parties in interest.

Mr. RAKER. That is the point exactly. The purpose of this bill is to reach out and get the information whereby the truth may be had, to find the situation and the condition of labor as specified in this bill in respect to women, girls, and so forth, and that any one who knows anything about it, whether they have lived here a week or a day or a month, who has seen the facts and conditions, may go before the board and have the right to testify and give testimony, and no one can say them nay. Under the provisions of this bill I am a little afraid that the commission or some one might raise the objection and say that this particular man or women can not testify because he or she is not interested, because he or she is not an employer and is not an employee. In other words, he may be simply a citizen looking on, who knows the facts but who can not give them, and I am fearful of the language; but if the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. HILLIARD] with his full investigation and astuteness and learning on this particular question thinks it will not exclude anyone I would not like to interfere. Is that the gentleman's view?

Mr. HILLIARD. Yes; though I hate to have my astuteness and learning confined to this particular matter. However, that is my understanding—that it is entirely sufficient.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That the board is hereby authorized and empowered to ascertain and declare, in the manner hereinafter provided, the following things: (a) Standards of minimum wages for women in any occupation within the District of Columbia, and what wages are inadequate to supply the necessary cost of living to any such women workers to maintain them in good health and to protect their morals; and (b) standards of minimum wages for minors in any occupation within the District of Columbia, and what wages are unreasonably low for any such minor workers.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Just what does the gentleman having charge of this bill mean by subdivision a of section 9—

That the board is hereby authorized and empowered to ascertain and declare, in the manner hereinafter provided, the following things: (a) Standards of minimum wages for women in any occupation within the District of Columbia, and what wages are inadequate to supply the necessary cost of living to any such women workers to maintain them in good health and to protect their morals.

Mr. HILLIARD. May I inquire of the gentleman from California what particular part of that section is obscure to him?

Mr. RAKER. Not obscure, but the meaning of the last words "and to protect their morals."

Mr. HILLIARD. That is included, Mr. Chairman, as a part of the purposes of the act. Of course, we might bring in Webster and go into these things in great detail for the enlightenment of my friend from California, but I believe that no gentleman here understands these words better than the gentleman from California, nor what the purpose of them is in this bill.

Mr. RAKER. Well, now, the gentleman does not intend to state that if these women and minors in the District of Columbia are paid a proper living wage that their morals are going to be changed because of the lowness or highness of the wages more than any other people?

Mr. HILLIARD. Oh, yes; I think it is very helpful in that way, and that is really one of the purposes of the act. It is the underlying purpose, I think I may say.

Mr. RAKER. Not the fixing of the wage?

Mr. HILLIARD. The fixing of the wage is incidental to the great purpose that those who favor this legislation have in mind. The wage is incidental, it is not the end.

Mr. RAKER. Well, I know; but if you give the proper surroundings, healthful conditions, and give a proper, honest, decent living wage to the women you are not then going to have to legislate in regard to the morals, are you?

Mr. HILLIARD. No; nor do we say so here, Mr. Chairman. We say, in effect, in this section that proper wage arrangements will bring about these very things.

Mr. RAKER. True. Then why do not you leave these people where they belong and are entitled to, that when you give them an honest living wage, when you give them proper healthful conditions, they are in the same position as everybody else?

Mr. HILLIARD. Yes——

Mr. RAKER. The same condition. They are now standing above reproach in every walk of life, and when you pay them enough so as to give them proper living conditions and proper healthful conditions they are then in the same relation as those who are not compelled to work.

Mr. HILLIARD. That is the argument always made by those who do not look with favor upon legislation of this character.

Mr. RAKER. Oh, no; the gentleman is mistaken in that; the gentleman can not say that because a young lady is working for her living, when she gets a proper living wage, with proper, healthful conditions, that she is any more subject to temptation than those who have luxuries. That is what I mean.

Mr. HILLIARD. That is the very purpose of this bill—to put them on a level and give them a chance to live properly.

Mr. RAKER. And raise the wage accordingly?

Mr. HILLIARD. That is the idea, Mr. Chairman, to raise the wage until they have a chance to live.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows.

SEC. 12. That, upon receipt of any report from any conference, the board shall consider and review the recommendations, and may approve or disapprove any or all of such recommendations, and may resubmit to the same conference, or a new conference, any subject covered by any recommendations so disapproved.

If the board approves any recommendations contained in any report from any conference, it shall publish a notice, once a week, for four successive weeks in a newspaper of general circulation printed in the District of Columbia, that it will, on a date and at a place named in the notice, hold a public hearing at which all persons in favor of or opposed to such recommendations will be heard.

After such hearing the board may, in its discretion, make and render such an order as may be proper or necessary to adopt such recommendations and carry them into effect, requiring all employers in the occupation affected thereby to observe and comply with such order. Such order shall become effective 60 days after it is made. After such order becomes effective, and while it is effective, it shall be unlawful for any employer to violate or disregard any of its terms or provisions, or to employ any woman worker in any occupation covered by such order at lower wages than are authorized or permitted therein.

The board shall, as far as is practicable, mail a copy of such order to every employer affected thereby; and every employer affected by any such order shall keep a copy thereof posted in a conspicuous place in each room in his establishment in which women workers are employed.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. Why should not the employees be furnished with a copy of these orders as well as the employers?

Mr. HILLIARD. Well, I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the effect of any such order will be in a sense visited on the employers. The employees will understand what their rights are and the copy going to the employer will indicate to him what his duties are.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; but they might send a copy of this order to the employer and it might be lost and the employees would not know it had been sent. Now, if the employees all have a copy of the order there is surely no misunderstanding about the order?

Mr. HILLIARD. Of course, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Massachusetts thinks it should be amended so the copy would go to everybody he might submit such an amendment, but I think it unnecessary myself.

Mr. WALSH. That was the purpose in inquiring, to draw it to the attention of the gentlemen and the committee to see whether it might be necessary to notify the employees.

Mr. HILLIARD. My notion is that the employees will all know about it. It is a matter of public concern and much publicity will attend it, and I think they will know all about it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. That for any occupation in which only a minimum time-rate wage has been established, the board may issue to a woman physically defective or crippled by age or otherwise impaired, a special license authorizing her employment at such wage less than such minimum time-rate wage as shall be fixed by the board and stated in the license.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. May I ask the gentleman from Colorado in charge of the bill, if he does not think the "age," line 1, page 10, should be made more explicit? The bill reads that "the board may issue to a woman physically defective or crippled by age or otherwise impaired." Now the expression "or otherwise impaired" after the expression "crippled by age" is a rather clumsy one. Who is impaired?

Mr. HILLIARD. I think it is entirely possible, Mr. Chairman, that those words were not selected with the greatest care in the world. Yet I think they reasonably set forth the intention of the legislation.

Mr. LONDON. Would it not be better to say "shall issue to a woman whose earning capacity has been impaired by reason of age or otherwise"?

Mr. HILLIARD. I think that might be helpful.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I move the following amendment. After the word "woman," line 1, page 10, insert the following words: "whose earning capacity has been impaired by age or otherwise," and strike out the words "physically defective or crippled by age or otherwise impaired."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LONDON: Page 10, line 1, after the word "woman," strike out "physically defective or crippled by age or otherwise impaired," and insert in lieu thereof "whose earning capacity has been impaired by age or otherwise."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York why he desires to substitute that language for the language of the bill? I did not hear the conversation he had with the chairman of the committee.

Mr. LONDON. Well, the expression "physically defective or crippled by age or otherwise impaired" is not a smooth expression. "Or otherwise impaired" has no application to anything that precedes the expression. You do not speak of a woman as impaired. It is simply a question of phraseology.

Mr. WALSH. You substitute simply "whose earning capacity has been impaired"?

Mr. LONDON. Exactly.

Mr. WALSH. Whether she is crippled or physically defective, or for any other reason?

Mr. LONDON. Yes; or for any other reason.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 14. That the board may at any time inquire into wages of minors employed in any occupation in the District of Columbia, and determine suitable wages for them. When the board has made such determination it may make such an order as may be proper or necessary to carry such determination into effect. Such order shall become effective 60 days after it is made; and after such order becomes effective and while it is effective it shall be unlawful for any employer in such occupation to employ a minor at less wages than are specified or required in or by such order.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Colorado a question. I want to know whether this board has jurisdiction in fixing the wages of just those who are employed in the District of Columbia or does this involve all the departments of the Government?

Mr. HILLIARD. Oh, no. This only has to do with private employment in the District.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Private employment?

Mr. HILLIARD. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Do they have plenary powers to fix these wages under this section 14, and when they are fixed is that action final?

Mr. HILLIARD. In a subsequent section provision is made for appeal.

Mr. KINCHELOE. It applies only to those working in private employment in the District of Columbia?

Mr. HILLIARD. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. HILLIARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to the first section, line 4, on page 2, and call attention first to the amendment which was placed there by the committee on motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH]. The amendment reads, after the insertion of a comma after the word "thereof," in line 4, "but shall not include domestic servants." It seems to me that might be made a little clearer if it read "that it shall not include domestic servants in family employment." The phrase "in family employment" I believe would be helpful. And I ask unanimous consent to offer that amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to return to the first section, in line 4, page 2, for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I do not think we should return for that purpose. I think this is a matter that can be arranged later, and therefore I object.

Mr. HILLIARD. The gentleman from Massachusetts is well within his rights.

Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman suspend for a moment?

Mr. HILLIARD. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. On page 11, under the provision as to appeal, there is a provision that the right of appeal by the board to the Supreme Court is made definite, but the method is not. Would it not be well to add a clause there to the effect that the Supreme Court may prescribe a method of appeal from the board?

Mr. HILLIARD. I do not understand the gentleman's statement.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. On page 11, lines 3 and 4, there is a provision that there shall be a right of appeal from the board to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. The method of taking this appeal is not fixed. Would it not be well to add a clause at the end of the paragraph to the effect that the Supreme Court may prescribe the method of taking the appeal from the board?

Mr. HILLIARD. Personally I see no objection to that suggestion. But I think likely it is unnecessary.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to section 17 for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to return to section 17 for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. Let the amendment be reported first.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I can give the amendment that I intend to propose. On page 11, line 10, after the word "board," insert "the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia may prescribe the method of appeal from the board."

Mr. RAKER. Under the law now anybody has the right of appeal.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The right of appeal and the method of appeal are two altogether different things.

Mr. RAKER. If you give a man the right of appeal, there is a general rule providing the method. If you give the right of appeal, the ordinary procedure is laid down.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is entirely in error. If the gentleman wants to object, I do not care anything about it. It is wrong as a matter of law.

Mr. RAKER. It is not necessary, and I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN]?

Mr. RAKER. I object.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, before this motion to rise is carried I wish to address the committee for two minutes, and I move to strike out the last word of the last section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, I had the pleasure of sitting as one of the subcommittee in the hearings. There seemed to be some questions asked by my colleagues over here as to the merits of the bill. I wish to say that it has received the indorsement of the health officers not only in the District but as to its principle all over the United States. The American Federation of Labor and the Retail Merchants' Association, which was supposed to be in opposition to this bill, have generously agreed to recommend it and did recommend it before the committee at the hearings.

As to the need of immediate action for the protection of the women and children of the District, I beg leave to insert in the RECORD, or read now, if there is any objection to inserting it, the statement by Miss Mary O'Sullivan, of Washington, D. C., which gave the condition before the war, in time of peace, and her statement as to the danger of going back to those wages after this war is over. That statement is:

Miss O'SULLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, I am about to tell you in a few words how I managed to live on $7 a week. The experience at best was a very unpleasant and sorrowful one, but I am willing to repeat it if it will make you understand or see a little more clearly the necessity for a minimum-wage bill in the District of Columbia. In 1915 it was very hard to get any kind of work in this city, and after several weeks of seeking and pleading I happened to get in a store where I became part of the machinery of that establishment for the handsome sum of $5 a week. After a short while I moved on and had to start in another store on the same salary. After working for that small wage for six months I one day plead for a raise and was granted one after a week's waiting, amounting to $1. That gave me $6 a week, and fate, who plays some interesting tricks at times, decreed that for some months I was to live on $6 a week.

That is an experience I do not like to talk about. It meant very meager service in a boarding house; it meant walking home from the down-town section to Eighteenth Street NW. in the warm summer, and it meant staying in and doing one's laundry, and it meant an aching heart. After seven or eight months at that wage I felt that I could not really get along any more on it, and I went to my boss again and pleaded with him for another raise. He told me that he would do the very best he could for me. He usually talked to you in that fashion about learning to labor and to wait; and I did wait, and after another two weeks I went back and asked if I was going to get a raise. He was still thinking, and after six weeks of thinking I managed to get another dollar.

Seven dollars a week amounts usually to about $30 a month. Living at that rate, of course, I could not be in town. So I happened to get board in a home in a suburb, which was charitable enough to take me in for $20 a month for room and board. Car fare was $2.50, and, besides, you had to dress and look neat. A girl living by herself and having no other remuneration naturally had no ready cash to buy clothes with. Therefore the store gave us "charges," and a charge costs you about $8 a month—$2 a week. That left me 50 cents a week for car fare, amusements, church collections, and other expenses. That shows the conditions of work in a store. In the morning a woman has to do a day's work in dusting and cleaning and such jobs before she starts to hustle around with the usual waiting in the store work of the day.

Now, there are girls in the stores who have been working for seven and eight years, and they are getting $7 and $8 a week after all those years of service. There are girls working in the stores to-day, after 12 and 14 years' service, for $10 a week. The second gentleman that spoke this morning said that the employers had the welfare of their employees at heart. I am very glad to hear it, because the other day in one of the stores one of these gentlemen was walking around, and he said to some of the girls: "You just wait until the war is over and all these war bureaus have closed, and many of the girls that have left will be glad to come back and you will be very glad to return to a $4, $5, and $6 a week wage."

We may have to go back to the stores again.

I am inserting that, Mr. Chairman, simply to answer the questions I have heard here on the floor as to the necessity of immediate action, and I call attention to the fact that so far as the District of Columbia is concerned there is no commercial organization or an organization of any kind that is opposing it, and I hope there will not be a vote against the bill.

Mr. HILLIARD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report the bill favorably with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado moves that the committee rise and report the bill with sundry amendments to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12098) to protect the lives and health and morals of women and minor workers in the District of Columbia and to establish a minimum wage board, and define its powers and duties, and to provide for the fixing of minimum wages for such workers, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the bill back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. HILLIARD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HILLIARD, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the minimum-wage bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the minimum-wage bill.

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, these, I assume, are the gentleman's own remarks?

Mr. LONERGAN. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on next Friday I may have 20 minutes in which to address the House on the subject of an international league to secure peace.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that next Friday, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of the business on the Speaker's table, he have 20 minutes in which to address the House on the subject of an international league of peace.

Mr. RAKER. Reserving the right to object, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] is not present. We have agreed to dispose of the water-power bill. Would not the gentleman from New York let his request go until after that is disposed of? We agreed that to-morrow, without objection, we would spend two hours on general debate. If we take out Friday somebody else will want to take time. That water-power bill ought to be disposed of.

Mr. LONDON. I would like to change my request and ask that to-morrow, after the other speeches are delivered, I may be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that after Mr. RODENBERG and two or three other gentlemen have concluded their remarks to-morrow he may have 20 minutes in which to address the House on the subject of an international league of peace.

Mr. LONDON. To secure peace. I draw that distinction.

The SPEAKER. On the subject of an international league to secure peace. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from New York on the subject of a united country adding to the military strength of the Government.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] he be allowed to address the House for 15 minutes on the subject, "A united country adds to the military strength of the Government." Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. Reserving the right to object, is that Friday or to-morrow?

Mr. MASON. To-morrow.

Mr. RAKER. That means practically, from all indications, that all of to-morrow is to be taken up by speech making, and no opportunity given to commence the consideration of the water-power bill under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CARRYING CONCEALED WEAPONS IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 12224 for present consideration.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do.

Mr. WALSH. That is this concealed-weapon bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman think that ought to be considered in the absence of a quorum? It is rather important.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It is an important bill; but I can not see how there can be much opposition to it, if any.

Mr. WALSH. I see; but if the gentleman wants to take that chance, all right.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12224) to punish the carrying of concealed deadly weapons in the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter it shall be unlawful in the District of Columbia for anyone except a peace officer in and for the District of Columbia to carry a deadly weapon concealed upon or about the person.

Whoever violates the provisions of this act shall, upon conviction, be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary not less than one year nor more than five years.

Whenever anyone is convicted of a second offense under this act the punishment shall be not less than five years in the penitentiary, and upon the third conviction for a like offense the punishment shall be confinement for life in the penitentiary.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] is recognized for an hour.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, conditions in the District of Columbia, as the result of carrying concealed deadly weapons, have grown to a horrible and frightful extent. Scarcely a day passes here without a homicide or a wounding as the result of carrying concealed deadly weapons. I take it for granted that the House is thoroughly advised of the condition which exists, and that the House knows how bad this condition is, and that something must be done to put a stop to it.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. And in my opinion nothing short of making it a felony is going to stop it, because the law already in existence is rather severe; and if that does not stop it I am in favor of going to any extreme measure in order to stop it.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do.

Mr. LONDON. Has the gentleman any statistics regarding crimes of this character?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No; I have no statistics, but I see it generally stated that there are more homicides in the 7 miles square of the District of Columbia than there are in any State of the Union.

Mr. LONDON. And it should be easy to obtain definite information on the subject here.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I take it for granted that that might have been done and still might be done, but I do not see the importance of it. We know that these crimes are going on as the result of carrying concealed deadly weapons, and the exact extent of them ought not to either pass the bill or defeat it.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I understood the gentleman's question to be directed to the extent of crime.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. He wanted to know if I had any statistics as to the number of homicides committed in the District of Columbia, which I have not.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Is there anything to indicate about how general the carrying of concealed weapons is in the District?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I only know from the newspaper reports and the court trials that the law in this respect is being violated to an outrageous extent.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. I observe that the bill carries life imprisonment for a third conviction.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Is not that rather severe?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Of course, it is severe; but I do not think it is severe enough.

Mr. KNUTSON. Why not hang a man!

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I would be in favor of it for the third offense.

Mr. KNUTSON. Is not this an invasion of the inherited rights of people in certain parts of the country?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do not understand the gentleman's question. If there is any inherited right to violate the law of the land I certainly do not know of it. Does the gentleman?

Mr. KNUTSON. Of course, custom sometimes prevails over law.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do not know of any part of the country where custom prevails over the law in this respect.

Mr. KNUTSON. In all seriousness, the punishment provided in this act is too severe. I think the gentleman will admit that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No; I will not admit anything of the kind. I contend that when a man has been twice convicted of carrying concealed deadly weapons he becomes a dangerous outlaw, and there is no penalty too severe for him, and he can only be convicted of the third offense when he has been convicted twice before.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman state what the present law is? I notice that the report is not very illuminating; an exception, as the reports which the gentleman usually files are illuminating.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The report is not illuminating for the reason that I wrote it simply to comply with the rule of the House, believing that no argument was necessary.

Mr. WALSH. Now that it appears that some argument is necessary, will the gentleman state what is the present law upon this subject?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The carrying of concealed weapons in the District of Columbia is only a misdemeanor punishable by fine and imprisonment.

Mr. WALSH. What imprisonment?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Not to exceed six months is my information; but I am not sure of this.

Mr. WALSH. Now, what is a deadly weapon under the law of the District? How is that question determined? Is that a question of fact for the jury or is there some code provision?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The decisions of the courts here already have determined what is a deadly weapon.

Mr. WALSH. Under this it would be unlawful for a soldier or officer of Marines to walk down Pennsylvania Avenue with a revolver in his hip pocket covered up by his coat, would it not?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; it would be and ought to be.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman says it ought to be.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. And it would be unlawful for a detective of the local police department out on an investigation to carry a gun in his coat pocket?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It would not under this bill.

Mr. WALSH. The courts do not construe a detective attached to the police force to be a peace officer, do they?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Certainly. There are no detectives under the municipality unless they are policemen. They are all in the police class.

Mr. WALSH. Take a detective from the city of Baltimore, coming over here seeking to apprehend a criminal.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. He could not make an arrest in the District of Columbia, and therefore there is no necessity for his being armed.

Mr. WALSH. He might need to be armed in self-defense when going into some dive or place of refuge where criminals go. He might go to see if a man was there, and he might be recognized, and it might be necessary for him to have some arms on his person.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. A Maryland officer would come into the District of Columbia only as a private citizen. He could not come otherwise. I believe the gentleman is digging up scarecrows.

Mr. WALSH. No. I do not think we ought to pass legislation here upon the subject of carrying concealed deadly weapons, which is going to put the District of Columbia in a class by itself, and advertise it as being a community filled up with gun-toters and dirk-carriers and razor-wielders.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The newspapers have saved us that trouble. They have advertised it.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman, of course, is aware that the business of the newspapers is to print news, whether it accords strictly with the facts or not, and the gentleman ought not to press this bill without showing that there has been any increase in the number of arrests under the present law. The gentleman speaks about homicides. There is no evidence that the homicides were committed by concealed deadly weapons. I have read of two or three homicides this summer that were not committed by weapons at all. For instance, a woman went out on an automobile ride with two deserters and the chauffeur was killed with an iron bar.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That was in the State of Virginia.

Mr. WALSH. It was in this vicinity, and they started from this city.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will say that common sense and decency are relied upon for the passage of this bill and not statistics, and when it comes to newspaper reports the newspaper publishes the court proceedings.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman state how many more homicides there have been in the District of Columbia in the last 12 months than the preceding 12 months, and how many of those were due to parties carrying concealed deadly weapons?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I can not give the statistics, and I am surprised that anybody depends on statistics for opposition to this bill.

Mr. WALSH. And I am surprised that the gentleman, chairman of this important committee, should come into the House and ask to amend the existing law so as to provide that on a conviction of the third offense that they shall be confined in the penitentiary for life, without any statistics or reason except, as he says, common sense. It is no reason for the passage of the bill that the gentleman's common sense urges him to submit the proposed legislation. There should be some further reason than that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I relied upon the gentleman's common sense in supporting the legislation.

Mr. WALSH. That is an unsafe thing for the gentleman to do in any proposition submitted by him.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I disagree with the gentleman. I regard it as safe to rely on his common sense.

Mr. WASON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. WASON. Does this prohibition of carrying a deadly weapon concealed on the person mean that the civilian who is not a police officer is prohibited? I do not know what it means by saying "peace officer in the District of Columbia."

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It means the same in the District of Columbia as anywhere else in the country.

Mr. WASON. We usually call it "police."

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I looked it up and found that "peace officer" covered it. It includes all those who have a right to make arrests. It includes the United States marshals and his deputies.

Mr. WASON. Does this mean that he can carry a revolver on his person if he does not conceal it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The Constitution of the United States gives him that right.

Mr. WASON. He must carry it exposed?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. WASON. Has the committee considered the advisability of allowing the chief of police to issue a license to a man to carry concealed weapons?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; and that is a wrong we want to get righted by this bill.

Mr. WASON. Does the gentleman mean by "wrong" in places where they have the privilege of issuing licenses?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. A license can be granted in the District of Columbia to carry a concealed deadly weapon, but after the passage of this bill it could not be granted.

Mr. WASON. The point I want to get at is this: There are men, for instance express messengers, traveling about who have certain reasons for carrying concealed weapons.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If they carry them at all they ought to carry them openly. Whenever you make exceptions you make room for killing the measure.

Mr. WASON. Why should not the police officer carry them openly?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I saw a police officer this morning riding along in his shirt sleeves on a bicycle with his revolver exposed.

Mr. WASON. Why should he not be permitted to carry it concealed?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The police officer should be permitted to go armed. There is no particular reason why the revolver should be carried concealed, but there is a very good reason why he ought to have the protection of his coat over it to pevent the man whom he is undertaking to arrest from grabbing it. The coat is a great protection to him.

Mr. WASON. That may be. I do not object to that so far as the police officers are concerned, but it seems to me there are many persons who ought to be allowed to carry concealed weapons, men who are at work legitimately and ought to be protected.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Take the bank messengers.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Messengers of banks ought not to have the right to go armed any more than anybody else.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. How about agents of express companies?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. You could find a whole lot of exceptions like that which would destroy the usefulness of the bill. The bill ought to be general.

Mr. WASON. There are many States that have similar acts to this which permit the chief of police and the police commissioners to issue licenses to civilians.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; and in every case where it is allowed it has been abused.

Mr. WASON. The gentleman is in error, and I will ask him to furnish statistics as to the State of New Hampshire.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Statistics are the refuge of everybody who wants to defeat a meritorious measure. You can prove anything by statistics.

Mr. WASON. I do not think the gentleman's answer is quite fair.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Then I withdraw it.

Mr. WASON. Can the gentleman furnish statistics from my State showing that civilians have abused the privilege of license? I still insist that before the gentleman cast it aside with a general answer he examine the statistics.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will say to the gentleman and to the House that I have no more interest in this bill than has any other Member of the House. Neither have I any pride of authorship. I have brought it here, and it is now with the House. I do not care from a personal standpoint what becomes of it. Those of you who want to fight it from a statistical standpoint, or from any other, go ahead and do it and take the responsibility. In other words, this is something that is needed upon the face of things, and the necessity for it is patent. I am not going to stand here and further advocate it in the face of that patent necessity.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman will tell us, of course, about the patent necessity, will he not?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; and that is another quibble, and that is patent upon its face, too. If the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] does not realize that the enforcement of a more stringent law is necessary here, then he has not been observant of conditions.

Mr. WASON. If the gentleman will yield, he assumes that I am opposed to this measure, which is an error. My suggestion is to make it more workable and more effective.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; and that was the same plea put up by the people who are successful up to now in defeating the antiprofiteering rent bill. They wanted to make it "workable." I want to stop the carrying of pistols here, and knives and razors and all those things.

Mr. WASON. I hope the gentleman will not ask me to indulge in a discussion of the rent bill that we have heard so much about in connection with the peace proposition for the District of Columbia. My purpose, as I say, is to make this law workable and practicable.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time, and that will give the gentleman one hour, if he desires recognition, and he can discuss it to his heart's content.

Mr. WALSH. Under what rule is it that he gets an hour?

Mr. WASON. Mr. Speaker, I am not opposed to the bill, so I do not care to avail myself of the kind offer of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. WALSH. I would like the gentleman to yield some time to me.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I reserve the remainder of my time, and the gentleman from Massachusetts can be recognized in his own time and get an hour.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the bill, and I desire recognition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kentucky fights for a good and a bad thing with equal pugnacity. He is so certain of himself that he never admits the possibility that he may be wrong. This bill reads to me like one of the measures proposed in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries in dealing with religious dissentients. The bill provides a minimum penalty of not less than one year's imprisonment and not more than five years in a penitentiary for carrying a concealed weapon for a first offense, not less than five years for a second offense, and life imprisonment for a third offense. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] would make it impossible for the judge who tries the case to inquire into the circumstances mitigating the offense. He would make it impossible for the court to impose a nominal fine or to give a friendly warning to a first offender. The idea of compelling a judge who tries a case to impose a minimum penalty of not less than one year is in itself absurd.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Does not the gentleman think that the bill should allow the judge certain discretionary power?

Mr. LONDON. Of course. This means to deprive the judicial officer of the very functions which he is to exercise. Assume a man to be in total ignorance of the law to have been innocently carrying a revolver. The gentleman from Kentucky would impose upon the judge the obligation to inflict a minimum penalty of one year's imprisonment. It will give the judge no discretion at all. He would destroy his opportunity to exercise his judgment, to weigh the particular facts in the case.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Would not the gentleman's argument apply to every law on the Federal statute books?

Mr. LONDON. I am opposed to any law which compels a judge to inflict a minimum penalty irrespective of the facts in the case. Every such provision is fundamentally wrong, fundamentally absurd, and indefensible. Take the case of an innocent man who does not know of the existence of the law, and who has been carrying a revolver for years, though he may never have used it. He is brought into court and the judge, in spite of all of the facts in the case, is compelled to sentence the man to a penitentiary term and deprive him of valuable civil rights.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is exactly right.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. It is against the law now, is it not, to carry a concealed weapon?

Mr. LONDON. Yes; but the law now does not compel the judge to disregard mitigating circumstances. The law does not compel the judge to impose a minimum penalty of one year.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. They do not get any results from the operation of the law as it stands now, do they?

Mr. LONDON. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] has failed to present any facts outside of his own aggressive statement that so many offenses of this kind have taken place that it is necessary to adopt a drastic law. He has failed to present any facts which would justify us in changing the present law.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. It seems to me that the kind of law he proposes is the one we have now, and it is not working.

Mr. LONDON. That is what the gentleman has failed to prove. There is no such thing as any law working well. We have had for thousands of years laws against murder and larceny and burglary, and these offenses have been committed right along. Crime and criminals are the result of an unhealthy state of society. It has been proven beyond doubt that in some sections of Europe the number of crimes against property and person multiplies or diminishes with the condition of the harvest.

If the harvest of potatoes is good in certain sections of continental Europe, then the number of crimes against order and person is diminished; that is, if the harvest is good. If it be bad, crimes multiply. There are certain natural laws—the desire to live, to continue physical existence—and when the written law comes in conflict with this natural and supreme law of the living being to continue to exist, then the natural law will prevail over the written law. I can not at the present moment go into a discussion of the general question of crime and to what extent it is the result of unfavorable economic conditions. That is not before us at the present moment. I am arguing against a provision which forces the judicial officer to impose a minimum penalty. It is entirely contrary to the liberal policy which is being advocated throughout the country and being adopted throughout the world, to treat the first offender with kindness, with mercy, and with consideration. Throughout the country, in almost every State of the Union, there is a tendency to treat the first offender as a man who has committed an error unless it is shown that he has a criminal disposition.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. I will.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. If we change the penalty for the first offense, what would the gentleman say should be the penalty for the second offense?

Mr. LONDON. Let us see. I would retain the present provision of the law so far as the first offense is concerned and provide the penalty under existing law of six months or a fine of not more than $100, or both fine and imprisonment as a punishment for the first offense. Then I would put a corresponding penalty, a more severe one, for the second offense, and for the third offense we might provide 5 or 10 years; but to speak of life imprisonment for the carrying of a revolver after a man has been punished twice for carrying a revolver, which means carrying it without using it, because if he carried a revolver and used it unlawfully against somebody, he would be in jail for some very serious offense. You propose to put him in jail for life because he has on two occasions been found guilty of carrying a revolver without using it. I wonder if the gentleman from Kentucky wants to punish him for carrying it or for not having used it. [Laughter.] That seems to be the only logical conclusion. The bill is wrong, and the gentleman from Kentucky should devote his ability and his capacity as a fighter to something better. Defeat the bill. There is no occasion for adopting this draconic law. The District of Columbia is a pretty safe place to live in at present. We do not hear of frequent homicides or the frequent use of deadly weapons. The gentleman refuses to furnish statistics because he has not any, refuses to furnish facts because he has not any to present.

Mr. SANFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. I will.

Mr. SANFORD. I would like for the gentleman to give his opinion on this: If this law were enacted and some one desiring to get the better of you should slip a concealed weapon in your pocket without your knowledge, would not you be guilty and would not the court be compelled to sentence you under this act?

Mr. LONDON. The court would be compelled to punish the person and find him guilty of having a revolver in his possession, and no matter how innocent, no matter how harmless the intention or how technical the offense might be, the man would have to be sent to prison.

Mr. SANFORD. Does the gentleman think the court would have the right to suspend sentence?

Mr. LONDON. No; not under the language of this law.

Mr. SANFORD. In some jurisdictions it has been held that the court has the inherent right to suspend sentence regardless of any such provision of law. As to the District of Columbia I do not know.

Mr. LONDON. I understand the Federal courts have held such language binds them to impose a minimum penalty.

Mr. SANFORD. New York courts have not held that way.

Mr. LEA of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. I will.

Mr. LEA of California. As I understand this law, it makes it a felony for a man going through Washington to carry a revolver in his valise, would it not?

Mr. LONDON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. LEA of California. And totally ignores the element of the intention of the carrier in fixing this penalty?

Mr. LONDON. Entirely does away with it.

Mr. LEA of California. In my judgment, this law should be defeated. It is a monstrous thing. It would be a disgrace to the Congress of the United States, and will so appeal to every man's sense of justice who will stop to consider it. This law would make it a crime punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary for not less than one year simply because a man is innocently carrying a revolver. It is an elementary principle of the criminal law that the intent is one of the most essential elements. This is an offense that should be punished, which does not involve any intent, by a minimum fine of $5 or $10 or 5 or 30 days in jail. It would be a species of Puritanism; it would savor of an arbitrary enactment of law with a penalty out of all proportion to the offense involved that would not commend itself to the country if passed.

Mr. BAER. Does it not include women, too?

Mr. LEA of California. Yes.

Mr. BAER. I have heard of soldiers who have bought weapons for their wives whom they were leaving behind and who have traveled throughout the country, and it would also include those?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. It does not draw any distinction between the sexes.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for an hour.

Mr. WALSH. I move to strike out the enacting clause.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the enacting clause. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 12, noes 8.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky makes the point of no quorum, and evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The genteman from Massachusetts moves that the House adjourn.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. RAKER and Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky demanded a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 14, noes 6.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] makes the point of no quorum.

Mr. WALSH. Well, Mr. Speaker, the point of no quorum was pending on the previous question. It does not take a quorum on the motion to adjourn with the point pending.

The SPEAKER. I know. The Doorkeeper will close the doors; the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees.

Mr. WALSH. But, Mr. Speaker, I submit that the point of no quorum was pending upon the previous motion, whereupon a motion to adjourn was made and carried; and, as the Speaker had declared there was no quorum present on the previous question, there is no call of the roll on this motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. It does not take a quorum to adjourn.

Mr. WALSH. Certainly, it does not; and therefore the point of no quorum can not be made on the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. I know; but the gentleman had a perfect right to demand a division on the question, and also make the point of no quorum so that he could get a vote of the House on whether to adjourn or not. There is no earthly objection to having two points of no quorum on top of each other.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The first name had not been called on the roll, Mr. Speaker, and therefore the Speaker's ruling that there was no quorum present was premature.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, if the Speaker will permit one further word. Upon the motion to strike out the enacting clause the division was had, and the point of no quorum was made.

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. The Speaker had declared that evidently there was no quorum present, and before the roll was started to be called I made a motion to adjourn, upon which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] asked for a division, and on the division the motion was carried. Now, I submit it is not in order for him to renew the point of no quorum on the division for adjourning because it is already pending upon the motion to strike out the enacting clause, and the House has voted to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair believes the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is correct, and unless the gentleman from Kentucky——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. In order that we may see who is in favor of the continuance of the carrying of concealed weapons in the District of Columbia, I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a perfect right to demand the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn. There is no question on earth about that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It is a new principle if I have not.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. Those in favor of adjourning will, when their names are called, answer "yea," and those opposed will answer "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 12, nays 229, not voting 189, as follows:

The Clerk having completed the calling of the roll, several Members appeared at the bar of the House and voted.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I was not in the House. Can I vote anyway?

The SPEAKER. Yes. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. DENISON, and he voted in the negative.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, have they all qualified?

The SPEAKER. None of them has qualified except one. This was not a roll call on the question of a quorum. It was on a demand for the yeas and nays. Otherwise they will have to qualify.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Three bells distinctly rang, indicating a call of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, a point of no quorum has already been made, and this was a motion to adjourn after the point of no quorum had been decided. Under those circumstances it seems to me that when a point of no quorum has been decided it holds good that they should have the right to vote.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It is admitted that we were without a quorum.

Mr. WALSH. A division was asked on the motion to adjourn. The gentleman from Kentucky then asked for the yeas and nays, when 12 Members arose, which the Speaker announced was a sufficient number to get the yeas and nays.

Mr. FOSTER. There was already a question of a quorum before that.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, would 12 be a sufficient number?

The SPEAKER. Twelve was a sufficient number, owing to the number that were in the House.

Mr. WALSH. I withdraw my point.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws the point. I think he is wrong anyway. [Laughter.]

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The House refuses to adjourn. The vote will be taken on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] to strike out the enacting clause. A quorum is present, and the Doorkeeper will open the doors. Those in favor of striking out the enacting clause——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. The House having refused to adjourn, and the question recurring on the motion to strike out the enacting clause, is that now debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is debatable on its merits.

Mr. WALSH. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask for recognition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. RAKER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield for a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. RAKER. It is a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. WALSH. I do not yield for a parliamentary inquiry. I have been recognized.

Mr. RAKER. A point of order: Is the motion to strike out the enacting clause, after the House has divided, debatable?

Mr. WALSH. That is not a point of order.

Mr. RAKER. It is a point of order. I submit it to the Speaker. Is it debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is debatable on the motion to strike out on the merits of the bill.

Mr. RAKER. The House voted on this question to strike out the enacting clause, which was carried. A point of no quorum was raised, and it was found that there was no quorum present, and the roll has been called and it is ascertained now that a quorum is present. Can you now go back and commence to debate that question on the merits or otherwise? Must not the House now automatically vote on the question to strike out the enacting clause without debate?

The SPEAKER. When the Chair answered the question of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] he had forgotten that the House did vote on the question itself. Therefore the debate is too late.

Mr. RAKER. That is the point I make.

Mr. WALSH. The Speaker is taking into consideration, I assume, the fact that upon the vote to strike out the enacting clause the Speaker declared, in response to the point made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON], that there was no quorum present. Now, does not that vitiate all proceedings with reference to that motion?

The SPEAKER. I think not.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. We are in the middle of a vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, in a measure, forgot what happened, but he has thought about it since, and the parliamentary clerk has reminded him. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] moved to strike out the enacting clause, and on that a vote was had, a very small vote. It was 14 to 6, I think. Nevertheless a vote was taken. Then the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] made a motion to adjourn.

Mr. WALSH. I beg the Speaker's pardon; that is not the case. The gentleman from Kentucky made the point of no quorum. The Speaker said there was no quorum present, but before the roll was called I moved to adjourn.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. And we revert immediatey on the taking of the vote——

The SPEAKER. I think there is no question about the motion to strike out the enacting clause; and if so, it is too late to debate.

Mr. LONDON. But, Mr. Speaker, the motion to strike out the enacting clause has not been disposed of.

The SPEAKER. I know; but it has been voted on.

Mr. LONDON. We have not voted on it, except that a division has been called.

The SPEAKER. A division has been had.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, the motion has not been disposed of.

The SPEAKER. I know it has not been disposed of, but we are in the process of disposing of it. It will take some time to get to the place to dispose of it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That was interrupted by the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. There is a time to debate, and then there is a time when it is too late to debate.

Mr. LONDON. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LONDON. Can the motion be withdrawn?

The SPEAKER. Can what be withdrawn?

Mr. LONDON. Can the motion to strike out the enacting clause now be withdrawn?

The SPEAKER. It can not. A vote was taken on it.

Mr. RAKER. The question is, when the motion is made to strike out the enacting clause, it is not debatable.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has just decided that it is not debatable because we have had a division on it. The question is on the motion to strike out the enacting clause.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, has the Chair announced the result of the vote?

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces that the motion to strike out is lost.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I move the previous question.

Mr. WALSH. The Chair recognized me to make a motion.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I was on my feet. The Chair said the noes seemed to have it, but did not announce the result. The motion for the previous question, if made, would have been premature until the Speaker did announce the result; and now, as quickly as the Speaker has announced the result, I have moved the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Kentucky is entitled to recognition. The gentleman moves the previous question.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. WALSH. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that the gentleman's point of order is dilatory.

Mr. WALSH. I make the point that the gentleman's point of order comes too late. It has got to be made before the count is taken.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Not until the result is announced.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the point comes too late. One hundred and fifty-six Members present, not a quorum.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, there is a motion pending before the House.

The SPEAKER. The motion pending is for the previous question. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] moves that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. LONDON. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were refused, six Members, not a sufficient number, seconding the demand.

The SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn is lost. The question is on ordering the previous question. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 97, nays 145, answering "present" 1, not voting 187, as follows:

A quorum being present the doors were opened.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons within the District of Columbia to have concealed about their person or to carry openly any pistol, bowie knife, dirk or dirk knife, blackjack, dagger, sword cane, slung shot, brass or other metal knuckle, and any person or persons having any of said weapons or instruments concealed about the person or carrying the same openly in the District of Columbia shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 or imprisoned in the penitentiary for not less than one year nor more than three years: Provided, That prosecutions under this act shall be had by indictment in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia: And provided further, That the officers, noncommissioned officers, and privates of the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps, police officers, officers guarding prisoners, officials of the United States or the District of Columbia engaged in the execution of the laws for the protection of persons or property, when any such persons are on duty, shall not be liable under this act.

"SEC. 2. That so much or any section of the act approved May 11, 1898, entitled 'An act to punish the carrying or selling of deadly or dangerous weapons within the District of Columbia, and for other purposes,' which is inconsistent with this act, and only so far as the same may be inconsistent herewith, is hereby repealed."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the present law, as I find it on the statute book, is section 855, against carrying concealed weapons, which reads as follows:

Any person who shall, within the District of Columbia, have concealed about his person any deadly or dangerous weapon, or who shall openly carry any such weapon, with intent to unlawfully use the same, shall be fined not less than $50 nor more than $500, or be imprisoned not exceeding one year, or both: Provided, That the officers, noncommissioned officers, and privates of the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps, or of any regularly organized militia company, police officers, officers guarding prisoners, officials of the United States or the District of Columbia engaged in the execution of the laws for the protection of persons or property, when any of such persons are on duty, shall not be liable for carrying necessary arms for use in performance of their duty.

And then it goes on and authorizes the court to grant permission to certain individuals to carry concealed weapons. The point involved in this bill, as well as the bill presented in the amendment by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], is the character of the punishment. In looking over the various punishments that are provided I find that the punishment provided in this bill is greater than that for manslaughter. It is greater, practically, than all the other highly criminal provisions in the statutes, such as forgery, falsely issuing certificates of a notary public or justice of the peace, and many other of the real acts that are criminal. Malicious injury and forgery and one other are the only ones that have extreme penalties provided in this act. The punishment in this act is greater than embezzlement; it is greater than that provided for stealing property, for petty larceny; greater than that for blackmailing or robbery. The penalty provided in this present proposed legislation is more extreme than the offense of robbery.

Now, it does not seem possible that if a person carries a concealed weapon he should be punished more severely than a person who commits actual robbery. Assault with intent to kill is not punished as severely as this bill provides for carrying concealed weapons. As I stated, manslaughter is not punishable under the Code of the District of Columbia as severely as provided for in this bill for carrying concealed weapons. The most of them have only a maximum penalty, and the only one that has a minimum and maximum is forgery. That is not less than 6 months and not over 15 years. Here you give a minimum and no discretion in the court whatever. The jury finds the man guilty and he must go to State's prison for a year. The court can send him to prison for five years, and if he is convicted on a second offense he shall be punished for not less than five years in the penitentiary, and for the third offense he is punishable in the penitentiary for life.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. Is not the uniform tendency of the court to consider first offenders leniently and often to let them go without punishment?

Mr. RAKER. Yes. My experience is that it is not the punishment that is inflicted on a man, it is the certainty of the punishment that deters criminals and that prevents the violation of law. The universal sentiment of the American people to-day and the civilization of the world is to do away with severe penalties. Under the common law there used to be 32 offenses punishable with death. Among them was grand larceny, robbery, and many other offenses which are punished to-day with less than a year's imprisonment. We now make the sentence indeterminate, so that a man may have an opportunity, after a reasonable length of imprisonment, to be paroled, and then after a period of probation let go for the purpose of making good. He is then in a position to be turned loose and no record is kept against him. It seems to me that the present provision of the law does not warrant us here in the House of taking a step backward and saying that the only method by which you can enforce the law is to put on an unusual, severe, and extended punishment, when as a matter of fact all those who have given this question thought and study believe in a short imprisonment, even if you make the term longer to start with before the man can be turned loose, and that you get better results, particularly with first offenders. The question of probation in many States has worked ideally. If a man pleads guilty the court may suspend the sentence and allow the man to go home upon condition that he pay all the expenses, and after he has made good the record is entirely wiped out against him and the man stands an American citizen and has the right to make good. And the record of this country for the last 15 years shows that we have been getting better results by treating men humanely who have, perchance, violated the law, rather than by imposing long terms of sentence upon them, so that they have a chance of making good, and they have made good; but if a man is imprisoned for a long time with confirmed criminals, he never becomes a good citizen thereafter.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Does the gentleman know how Congress can by legislation secure certainty of punishment?

Mr. RAKER. I think so.

Mr. DENISON. How can it be done?

Mr. RAKER. By putting the penalty within the discretion of the courts, so that when a jury brings in a verdict they know that the judge is humane and fair and will do the right thing, so that they will know that he has the discretion of sending the man to jail for one month or five years, and that he will fix the judgment and fix the imprisonment according to the degree of the crime and the facts that have been brought out during the trial of the case. If the jury know, however, in advance that the man must go to a State prison for a year, they are going to hesitate a long time about convicting some of these young men and they will turn them loose, as they ought to do.

Mr. DENISON. The point the gentleman makes is that the punishment should be elastic and should be within the discretion of the courts.

Mr. RAKER. Certainly. That is what I mean, and that is provided for in most of the legislation in the code of the District. There are only a half dozen cases where the minimum punishment is fixed, leaving the maximum to the discretion of the courts. The discretion is left in the court, and that is done in practically all cases. If the jury has brought in a verdict, the court summarily, after the verdict and before fixing or rendering judgment, permits, in many cases, in open court testimony to be heard for the purpose of determining the length of punishment, and that is a rule that has worked splendidly and is working splendidly all of the time, because the judge himself should at least make the term commensurate with the manner in which the crime has been committed. In this act, and in legislation of this kind, there is no question of intent involved. The mere fact that a man goes from the Union Station up to his hotel with his six-shooter in his pocket, in his overcoat, makes him guilty of an offense by which he can be sentenced to State prison for five years under this proposed law.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Would he not be also guilty if he kept it in his grip?

Mr. RAKER. If he carried it in his hand; yes.

Mr. LONDON. And the court would be helpless in the matter.

Mr. RAKER. Absolutely helpless. He must give him at least a year; and that is what I am getting at. The court could not help itself.

Mr. LONDON. There is no discretion at all.

Mr. RAKER. No discretion, if the jury finds him guilty; he must give him at least a year in prison. It may be perfectly proper for a man in his own State to carry a weapon, or if his business is such, coming to Washington, for the protection of his property and person, to carry a revolver in his grip or in his overcoat; but when he gets to the District of Columbia, under this bill, if he carried that grip or overcoat from the station to the hotel and anyone should detect him, he could be convicted.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The intention of the bill is to punish that very offense. I knew of an instance, of which the Speaker of this body is quite familiar, where a man never carried a pistol in any other way except in a small valise, and one day he got into a quarrel and opened his valise and pulled out one of three pistols he had with him and killed a man.

Mr. RAKER. You could not stop that man if you had 40 laws.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Oh, yes, you could, because if he had been convicted of carrying concealed weapons he would have been in the penitentiary.

Mr. RAKER. This man had three guns, and he was bent on mischief; he was bound to break the law and take some man's life, and if you passed this law or a dozen such laws he would go and get a gun and put it on his person and would seek out the man he wanted to kill and would attempt to do so. No matter what laws you pass, you will not prevent a man who has murder in his heart from committing murder. The only thing to do with a man of that kind is, after he has committed murder, to punish him.

Mr. DENISON. Does the amendment that has been offered meet with the views of the gentleman?

Mr. RAKER. No; the amendment offered carries a minimum punishment of one year.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. And it is unconstitutional, also, because the bill prohibits anyone from openly carrying a pistol, bowie knife, etc., when the Constitution provides that a well-regulated militia being necessary to the security of every State, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed.

Mr. RAKER. That may be all right, and no doubt is; but this law on the statute books now provides "who shall carry openly any such weapon," and if it stopped there it would be unconstitutional, without doubt; but it goes on and says "with intent to unlawfully use the same." Anyone who carries a weapon, concealed or otherwise, with the intent to unlawfully use the same, to take life or feloniously assault his fellow man, is guilty of a crime under all of the laws. There is no doubt about that. The mere fact that men are killed with pistols or guns will not prevent other men who have murder in their hearts from taking the life of fellow men, and the fact of making it a life imprisonment to carry a concealed weapon will not deter one who has murder in his heart from committing the crime.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman say the law now in existence prohibits the carrying of deadly weapons with unlawful intent?

Mr. RAKER. It does.

Mr. CANNON. And it provides an apt penalty?

Mr. RAKER. It does.

Mr. CANNON. Well, what is the necessity of any law if that is the case?

Mr. RAKER. What I am getting at is this——

Mr. CANNON. I mean what additional legislation.

Mr. RAKER. Why should Congress, against all humane legislation, place upon the statute books such legislation that we had under the common law a hundred years ago, whereby 32 offenses were punishable by death, and to-day we have only two?

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me. I know of a case where a chauffeur, a perfectly honest, inoffensive man, driving his car to the garage after he served the owner of the car or the owners of the car after midnight down on M Street on Connecticut Avenue was held up by two colored men and robbed of all the money the poor fellow had—$65—and I do not think he had any weapon to defend himself; and in the existing condition in Washington if you go to the lonesome parts of the city with the best of intent or go to your home or because you have the right to go there you are liable to be assaulted by thieves. I would not advise a friend of mine to go to certain parts of the city without being armed after midnight.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman's question presents in my mind what I stated to one of the Members in discussing the matter a moment ago, and that is that under this bill if a person visits a neighbor at night, the wife, if you please, and children, and she knows that her husband is away from home, and she walks a block and a half to that home knowing she is going to be late, and takes her revolver with her to protect her life and her children, she is guilty of a crime and may be sent to State's prison for five years, although the man who would rob her is punishable less than the woman who carries a gun to protect her life and liberty.

Mr. CANNON. It seems to me the law had better stand as it is from what the gentleman says; that it is sufficiently severe, because he must carry the deadly weapon with intent unlawfully to use it.

Mr. RAKER. That is the law.

Mr. CANNON. Then what is the use of any additional legislation?

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. In line 5, first page, it says, "to carry deadly weapons." Now, would not a jackknife be a deadly weapon if used for that purpose?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; a jackknife will take a man's life.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman confines his remark exclusively to guns and I wanted to call his attention to the fact that a jackknife would be a deadly weapon.

Mr. RAKER. It does not need to be a jackknife. A knife with a blade that would reach a man's heart would be a deadly weapon, and that would be only an inch and a half or 2 inches.

Mr. KNUTSON. A penknife?

Mr. RAKER. It would be a sufficiently deadly weapon.

Mr. POU. Or a razor.

Mr. RAKER. Any deadly weapon.

Mr. POU. A man could not carry shaving materials along with him.

Mr. RAKER. No; that is true, and it ought not to be. The only thing I am contending for is that the penalty is too severe. The penalty should be commensurate with the offense committed. We are all in favor of the law against carrying concealed deadly weapons. The whole controversy here is as to the severity of the penalty provided in the proposed legislation.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for an hour.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, this bill (H. R. 6525), which was introduced by myself, was introduced on the 3d day of December, 1917. It is rather an old citizen. I have introduced the same bill for a number of years. It was several years ago considered by the House. The present chairman of the District Committee was then chairman, and reported the bill with amendments, but when it was considered there were so many amendments put on in the House as to render it practically worthless, and, as I now recall, I think both the chairman and myself voted against the bill; but it was passed as amended and sent to the Senate, but nothing was done in the Senate. I introduced it and have reintroduced it ever since. This bill, of course, was introduced some 8 or 10 years ago. It was intended to meet conditions that then existed and still exist, in a more intensified form.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I voted for the previous question on the bill now being considered, reported by the committee at this time, because conditions are different now, and, I think, aggravatingly different. Just think about the situation at this time in Washington, D. C.! Here are thousands upon thousands of girls—young ladies—in the District of Columbia who have come here on account of war service. Now, we are having night service, especially in the War Department, and I do not know how many others, and young ladies, without any protection whatever, are leaving the War Department after 11 o'clock at night, and have to go to their lodgings or boarding houses or homes, wherever they are, unprotected and at the dead hours of the night, and there is no way for them to avoid it. Now, why should anybody in the District of Columbia want anybody else to carry concealed pistols, bowie knives, dirks or dirk knives, blackjacks, daggers, sword canes, slung shots, brass or other metal knucks—why should anybody want the opportunity to carry, either openly or concealed, that kind and character of deadly weapons?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Suppose one of these girls takes a revolver in her pocket to protect herself, would you want to send her to the penitentiary for doing it?

Mr. SIMS. I want to say to the gentleman that his is a pointed and pertinent question. If no man or woman is allowed to carry, either openly or concealed, the weapons I have mentioned, then the girl or woman alone would be protected in the sense that they would have no opportunity to assault her and commit a crime except with the bare fist or a stone or something of that sort.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. But the criminal does not regard those restrictions, does he?

Mr. SIMS. The criminal, of course, tries always to avoid detection and punishment. But look at the number of deaths which have occurred in the District of Columbia by violence, by the use of a pistol carried by a man where the police officer or officer enforcing the law could not possibly know that the man was armed with a deadly weapon concealed, and in attempting to execute the law the pistol was drawn and the officer shot down, as has been done in the District of Columbia.

Now, if we all knew that nobody, without committing a penitentiary offense, could carry any one of these weapons either openly or concealed it would break it up. They would not carry them. I also introduced a companion bill, to prevent the sale in the District of Columbia of any such weapon, but that was never reported or acted upon in the House. The present law provides for a fine only.

Mr. FOCHT. I would like to ask the gentleman whether it ever occurred to him that possibly the greater portion of crime committed in Washington is due to the fact that we have such little police protection, only about one-third as many policemen as ought to be here?

Mr. SIMS. So many policemen have already been killed in attempting to enforce law that it ought to be very much to their interest to make it unlawful to carry these deadly weapons. With such a law we would not need so many policemen as we do now.

Mr. FOCHT. They were not very good shots, and at least would first have to find a policeman to shoot.

Mr. SIMS. A policeman is shot down by a man who has a pistol stuck in his hip pocket, and the policeman has no means of knowing it.

Mr. FOCHT. You were speaking particularly of the protection to the young ladies going home at night. If we had more policemen they would have more protection.

Mr. SIMS. When this bill was passed before we did not have war conditions on us. I only spoke of the fact that the need for such legislation was decidedly greater now than it ever was before.

I submitted the question of preventing the carrying of concealed weapons to the then corporation counsel of the District of Columbia, and he drew that part of it. I submitted the bill with reference to who should be permitted to carry a pistol to Maj. Sylvester, who was then chief of police, and he drew that part of the bill. The portion as to the punishment of not less than one year or over three years was my own. That is the only thing I did, and that was at a time when there was no war on hand, when Washington was normal. But it was needed then.

Now, I can tell you what occurred in Tennessee many years ago. At that time it was not unlawful to carry what was called in our country the bowie knife. Many homicides followed as a result of it. Men would carry bowie knives and get into a row somewhere and kill each other or kill somebody else. The question was how to prevent that character of homicide. So Tennessee passed a law making it a felony to carry a bowie knife and took away the plea of self-defense if one was used and a homicide followed. So the bowie knife lives only in history in that State. It ceased absolutely to be carriel when it was made a felony to carry it.

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. MOON. While that is true, it is also true that Tennessee has always refused to senselessly and foolishly pass any law to prevent the carrying of pistols and making the punishment more than $50 fine and six months in jail.

Mr. SIMS. That is undoubtedly true.

Mr. LANGLEY. In that connection will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SIMS. I will.

Mr. LANGLEY. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that Kentucky has also taken an advanced position on the bowie knife, pistol, and other questions of that character?

Mr. SIMS. I do not know what the law of Kentucky is on the subject. Tell me what it is.

Mr. LANGLEY. We are fully up to date with Tennessee on the question.

Mr. SIMS. Has Kentucky passed any law making it a felony for any except the exempted classes to carry a concealed weapon?

Mr. LANGLEY. All concealed weapons.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Kentucky has passed a law disfranchising a man who will carry one and makes it impossible for him to hold a position of honor and trust.

Mr. SIMS. That is one of the most progressive laws on that subject.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It is not progressive on that subject.

Mr. SIMS. Does it make it a felony?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Not only imposes a fine and imprisonment, but it also disfranchises.

Mr. SIMS. It does not make it a felony.

Mr. WALSH. Kentucky is humane.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I did not know that the gentleman from Massachusetts was acting on the humanitarian principle that the gentleman from California was. I do not object to that, except by way of commendation that they were humane in Kentucky.

Mr. SIMS. Before I was interrupted by the gentleman from Kentucky, I made the statement with reference to bowie knives and the law that was passed making it a felony to carry one at all, and that such carrying has ceased in Tennessee.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. LANGLEY. Some of my colleagues are in doubt as to whether there is any difference between a jackknife and a bowie knife and a machete. Will the gentleman enlighten the Members who are in doubt about that? [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMS. I may be mistaken as to individual instances, but I know that as a general rule that bowie knives are not carried like pistols in Tennessee. I know, further, that the fact that the State of Tennessee has not made the carrying of pistols concealed a felony is the reason why they are still carrying them and are still killing people with them.

Mr. MOON. Do you not know that it is a violation of the law in Tennessee to carry a knife over three and a half inches long?

Mr. SIMS. I know it is, but it is not a felony.

Mr. MOON. Hundreds of them are being carried there right now.

Mr. SIMS. I do not know that as a fact, but if it is a fact it is because we have made it merely a misdemeanor and not a felony. Now, if we want to prevent the carrying of pistols in Washington in time of war, the only way to break up the practice of carrying them is to make it a felony.

As to whether the third offense, as provided in the bill reported by the gentleman from Kentucky, should be imprisonment for life or not is an open question. The bill is open to amendment as to that. We can reduce the penalties, but if we make the offense punishable merely by a workhouse sentence or a fine, the law will never be obeyed to the extent of breaking up the practice.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. There is no question among any of us that the carrying of concealed weapons should be prohibited under the law. I take it to be a general proposition that that is the prevailing opinion among us. Can the gentleman point out a case in the last year where anybody has been arrested for carrying a pistol, a bowie knife, a dirk or dirk knife, or a black jack, or dagger, or sword cane, or slung shot, or brass or other metal knuckles in the District of Columbia? Has there been any more violation of the law in the last year and a half than there was in the years before?

Mr. SIMS. I suppose there has been; but, to be honest with you, I must confess that I have not looked up the difference. I do not know about the slung shot. The pistol is the thing I am interested in. I speak of the pistol, because you can do the same thing with it. You can kill somebody with it without his having any opportunity to defend himself. But if you make it a felony, we all know that nobody will have these deadly weapons in his pockets.

Mr. RAKER. An ordinary piece of gas pipe, such as you use in your machine to jack with, could be used to kill a person with, could it not?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. The punishment provided here, the gentleman concedes, is too severe, does he not—not less than a year?

Mr. SIMS. If we want to break up the practice of carrying pistols it will require a form of punishment greater than has been tried in the District of Columbia so far to do it.

Mr. RAKER. Do you know of any cases in the District where they have given a man a year for carrying a concealed weapon?

Mr. SIMS. In this District?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. There is no law for it.

Mr. RAKER. Yes; there is a law that inflicts a punishment of a year for it.

Mr. SIMS. It is not made a felony, and they are still carrying pistols.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. The bill provides that punishment shall be confinement for not less than a year in the penitentiary. Why not say they shall be hanged by the neck until dead?

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman is not suggesting a practical remedy. If the penalty on conviction is too severe it will be very easy to reduce it. It is very easy to reduce all these penalties, but I am afraid that those who are fighting the punishment provided for the third conviction, as provided for in the Johnson bill, are opposed to the penalty provided for the first conviction. It is simply a question of whether you want to stop this practice or not. But when I introduced this bill, or one similar to it, several years ago, I know who came here and fought it. I do not know the individual names of the men, but I know the manufacturers of pistols were here and fighting the measure. They are not here this time, so far as I know, although I have not been looking after the matter. But it will be the only way by which we can stop the carrying of pistols, by making it a felony. I do not blame anybody for carrying a pistol in his pocket if others are permitted to do so and are not required to do anything more than pay a fine. Suppose you have an enemy and you know he is an unscrupulous, bad man, and you believe that he carries a deadly weapon, that he carries a pistol in his pocket. You are liable to meet him anywhere. The only way to defend yourself against that man is to do what he does. If he attempts to draw it, you can draw yours and get the first shot. Do you suppose that the War Department of the United States to-day would be doing everything on earth it can to invent a poisonous gas equal or superior to that used by the Germans if the Germans had never used any? The fact that the Germans use poisonous gas forces the allies to use it, not as a matter of choice, not because they would have advocated it—for it is forbidden by treaty—but it is made absolutely necessary, in order to defend against such attacks, to use the same kind of a weapon; and as long as men can carry pistols around in their pockets and take the chance of escaping punishment by not being seen with them, men who intend to commit crime will carry pistols in their pockets and force you and others to carry them, when you would not do it at all if the law was otherwise.

Mr. HARDY. Suppose a man's life has been threatened by just such a dangerous character as the gentleman spoke of, and that man has to take the chance of meeting his enemy at any time, and in order to protect himself he carries a pistol, under this bill is that any defense at all?

Mr. SIMS. Not under the terms of this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Neither it is any defense under the present law.

Mr. HARDY. It ought to be.

Mr. SIMS. It is not anywhere that I know of.

Mr. SISSON. There is a provision to cover that.

Mr. SIMS. I know; but a man has to go and make an affidavit and get a permit to carry the pistol, and that is a matter of public record.

Mr. HARDY. But even that would not do any good as a defense under this bill.

Mr. SIMS. No; because this law will make it unnecessary for anyone to carry a pistol.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I want the gentleman to understand that I thoroughly sympathize with the object he is trying to attain by this bill; but what has the gentleman to say about the constitutionality of this bill?

Mr. SIMS. The Constitution of the United States guarantees to every man the right to be armed, but it has been decided by court after court that you can provide by statute how he may be armed. You may provide by statute that he can not carry a bowie knife secretly, and you can provide by statute that he shall not carry it openly, and both provisions are constitutional, because that is not the only method of being armed. In our State they exempted a man who carried an Army or Navy pistol if carried openly in the hand. They could regulate the method of carrying it. Under the Constitution you can not prevent a man arming in his own defense, but you can prevent him arming with particular instrumentalities of defense. He can still go around with a shotgun on his shoulder or in his hands, perhaps, although it is a misdemeanor in some places to do that; but it all bears on whether or not you want to break up the carrying of pistols by the law-violating class.

This is not intended to prevent men defending themselves when they are in danger of death or great bodily harm, but it is intended to abolish the danger that makes it necessary or excusable to carry a pistol. It is to remove the excuse and the necessity for it, and we ought to pass a bill making it a felony, and provide some form of punishment that will deter the men who are going around armed with the intention of committing felonies.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Am I right in assuming that under the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts——

Mr. SIMS. That is the bill I introduced.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. That a judge after a verdict of guilty had been rendered by the jury could impose a fine of $25 if he desired?

Mr. SIMS. As the only punishment?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. No. Under the bill that I introduced——

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts is somewhat different.

Mr. SIMS. I did not know he had changed it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. It is different. It provides that the punishment may be a fine of not to exceed $5,000, or imprisonment in the penitentiary.

Mr. SIMS. That is not in my bill.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. So that under the Walsh amendment if the facts to justify it were presented to the judge he might fine a person $25.

Mr. SIMS. I am opposed to that.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. That being true, the judge having the right to impose that kind of a penalty, why say that is a felony, when under the common law, as I understand it, an offense punishable by either a fine or imprisonment is a misdemeanor.

Mr. SIMS. We can have the imprisonment as a punishment for a felony, and can also provide a lesser punishment. But I am not in favor of letting a man off with a fine. We have a fine now and it does not do any good. We can amend the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Tuesday, August 27, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

NEWS OF AIRCRAFT PRODUCTION.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I have just had handed me a copy of instructions from the Customs Service, in the form of a telegram sent to the Boston newspapers, and I assume to all other newspapers, which I consider it my duty to bring to the attention of the Senate, because the matter referred to relates directly and essentially to a Senate document, a report made by a Senate committee. Here is the telegram:

AUGUST 23, 1918.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS,
Boston, Mass.:

Do not license or permit exportation of newspapers of the edition of August 22 and 23, carrying report of aircraft subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs; also prevent taking out of any account of service reports in magazines, letters, or otherwise. This is in conformity with action of postal and cable censorship.

HALSTEAD, Customs Service.

This is the notice sent by the collector of the port of Boston to the newspapers:

Reference indorsement.
United States Customs Service.
Collection District No. 4, port of Boston, August 23, 1918.

POSTMASTER,
Boston, Mass.

SIR: I inclose herewith for your information copy of a telegram received in this office from the Treasury Department to-day.

E. BILLINGS, Collector.
R. G. FRY, Deputy.

Mr. President, I wish further to call attention to the fact that the report of the Military Committee made in the editions of last Friday, I think—Saturday's newspapers and Sunday's newspapers—were directly affected by this order. While the financial side of it is not of the first importance, it means that there is a mass of junk in every post office in the country. The newspapers of those three days which were going abroad in the regular course had many thousands of dollars of postage on them, and that, of course, is a complete loss to the press. Naturally the press published this report and published such comments as were made regarding it, and without any notice to them instructing them contrarywise this action was taken at half past 11 Sunday night, after the edition for Monday morning of the Boston papers was on the press.

I do not know how the Senate will feel about action of this kind. I am not confident that there may not be authority for taking it, but it seems to me most drastic and ill advised, because it is evidently intended to prevent certain information getting into the hands of our enemy, when everybody knows that that information, published in our press and published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD or elsewhere, is well known to our enemies, or will be, and that there can not be any force to that argument. It simply prevents the going abroad to our allies and to others of information which is public property in this country, necessarily public property, because it is the product of a Senate committee.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether the report of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs upon the aircraft investigation was not printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD?

Mr. WEEKS. Oh, yes; undoubtedly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It was; I saw it in the RECORD; but I wanted the Senator's statement in the RECORD.

Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator or some member of the Committee on Printing if they have any knowledge as to whether an order has been issued preventing the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD from going abroad or from going to our soldiers in France—the RECORD that contained the report of the aircraft investigation?

Mr. WEEKS. I have not any information on that subject, but I notice the chairman of the Committee on Printing is present. Perhaps he can answer the Senator's question.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the Senator looks at me. I was chairman of the committee, but the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] is chairman of the committee now.

I am sure the joint committee has no such information as is indicated by the Senator from Connecticut or never heard of any order being made anywhere prohibiting the RECORD from being distributed. There was a time when there was a limit to the circulation, but that time has passed. It was limited on account of the shortage of paper, but there is no order of that sort now.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The object of my inquiry, of course, is obvious. It is this: Many Members of Congress send the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to members of our Expeditionary Forces in France; I do for one. If the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD contains the report of the Committee on Military Affairs upon the aircraft investigation and that is sent to our Army abroad, and the recipients of it are liable to be captured and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is liable to fall into the hands of the enemy, why is not the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD prevented from going abroad? If the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is allowed to go abroad containing that report, what sense is there in preventing newspapers which contain the report from going abroad?

Mr. WEEKS. I can probably answer the question of the Senator from Connecticut by calling his attention to the reading of this telegram. It says:

Also prevent taking out—

Which I presume means taking out of this country—of any account of service reports in magazine, letters, or otherwise.

"Or otherwise" would undoubtedly include the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me one moment? Does not the wording of the telegram rather imply that the purpose of our Government is to conceal this knowledge from our own soldiers? The enemy already has knowledge of it. It looks to me as if the purpose of the order was concealment as regards our own Army. That is the only way I can explain it.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, it seems to me that the purpose is plain. If material appears which the Government says can not be sent abroad that will tend to make every newspaper refuse to publish that matter. The only people in the world to-day who are interested in the subject and who do not know about our aircraft business are the American people. What the condition is is perfectly well known to our allies and is perfectly well known to our enemies, and the effect of this would be to prevent the publication of anything relating to the aircraft situation in the newspapers by refusing the mails to them to go abroad. All important newspapers send more or less copies to Europe. If the publication of any matter will prevent their going abroad, cost them money, involve the loss of postage and all of that, of course they will omit that altogether, and it will never reach the American people. That is the real trouble, it seems to me.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WEEKS. I do.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I was going to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question, but I think it is so perfectly obvious that it scarcely needs an answer.

My opinion is that there is no dispute about the substantial accuracy of the facts which were stated in the aircraft report. Some of the allegations in the report related to publications in the Official Bulletin of the Government in regard to airplane production. Charges were made in the report that the statements in the Official Bulletin were not true, and, as I read the evidence, the Secretary of War admitted, as he termed it euphoniously, that there were gross exaggerations. The committee found that the statements were entirely misleading. The Official Bulletin is sent abroad in every mail that goes; the false statements of the Official Bulletin in regard to the Aviation Service are sent abroad; that misleading information is given to the world—to our soldiers and to our enemies—and a true statement of the situation is denied them.

Mr. WEEKS, Mr. THOMAS, and Mr. BRANDEGEE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] has the floor. To whom, if to anyone, does he yield?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will wait until the Senator from Massachusetts has finished.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, it seems to me there is one phase of this order relating to the sending out of this information that manifestly comes within the jurisdiction of the Senate, and that is the words "or otherwise," which necessarily would mean the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts give me his opinion as to whether or not, under the terms of the order which he has read from the department, a newspaper which prints an account of the debate which is now going on on the floor of the Senate will be allowed to go out of the country?

Mr. WEEKS. Well, I should think that it would be inhibited, or would be as likely to be as any other matter relating to the subject.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Do I understand the order to prevent comment by any newspaper upon the aircraft report?

Mr. WEEKS. I will read the order once more.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish the Senator would do so.

Mr. WEEKS. It reads:

AUGUST 23, 1918.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS,
Boston, Mass.

Do not license or permit exportation of newspapers of the edition of August 22 and 23 carrying report of air-craft subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs; also prevent taking out of any account of service reports in magazine, letters, or otherwise. This is in conformity with action of postal and cable censorship.

HALSTEAD,
Customs Service.

Mr. President, I was about to move that these telegrams be referred to the Committee on Printing to determine whether or not this prohibition is to apply to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and to report thereon to the Senate. I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. WEEKS. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have no objection to the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts. My principal purpose in rising was to suggest that this subject should not be allowed at present to interfere with the pending business, which is very important. The matter involved is one which probably will invoke more or less discussion, and as we are working under a unanimous-consent agreement and there are many amendments to the pending bill I hope that beyond the presentation of the motion—to which I do not object—we may go ahead with the business of the session.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. If this policy is to be followed, what is the use of the Senate debating anything any further? If publicity, when it becomes disagreeable to certain officials in the War Department, is to be prohibited in every newspaper and magazine and letter, we might as well adjourn the Senate to-day and let the War Department in secret session run the war.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, we can answer that question when we take up this matter for consideration. I am concerned now with the military bill.

Mr. PENROSE. What is the use of discussing the military bill and have an order issued from the customs officer tomorrow prohibiting the publication of the Senate debates?

Mr. THOMAS. Well, Mr. President, I will say that I think that argument is worthy of the Senator, but it is entirely beside the consideration of the military bill. Of course the Senator may think that the military bill amounts to nothing, but I do not think that. I think we should dispose of it.

Mr. PENROSE. I think the military bill is very important, and I object to the Senator from Colorado putting words in my mouth, Mr. President, but I think we ought to know whether or not free speech is to prevail in the Senate before we go on with the military bill.

Mr. THOMAS. Well, Mr. President, the Senator frequently and, I suppose, reluctantly breaks into his chronic vacation from the Senate to come down here and occupy the position of a faultfinder, and then accuses other Senators of putting words in his mouth, which I have not done. I want to go ahead with the business of the Senate; and I am perfectly willing, immediately after the pending bill shall have been disposed of, that the Senate shall, so far as I am concerned, take up and consider this question.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I think that the Senator from Colorado is right in wishing to go on with the military bill. I did not suppose this subject would take so much time when I read these telegrams. I think, however, that if the motion which I have made prevails, it will remove the obstruction, and we can immediately go on with the military bill.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not object to the motion.

Mr. WATSON. Will the Senator from Colorado permit me to make a suggestion.

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON. Will not the Senator from Massachusetts permit this matter to lie over a day before finally sending it to a committee?

Mr. WEEKS. Then, Mr. President, I will change my motion, if I may be permitted to do so, to a motion that this matter lie on the table.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Subject to the call of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not know to what matter the Senator from Massachusetts refers.

Mr. LODGE. My colleague refers to the telegrams which he has read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks that the telegrams which he has read shall lie on the table.

Mr. WATSON. Subject to his own call.

Mr. WEEKS. Subject to call.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If such a proceeding is in order under the rules, of course the matter may later be called up; but the Chair does not undertake now to decide one way or the other. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

CHANGES IN DRAFT AGE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12731) amending the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, as bearing upon the amendment which is now pending, I send to the desk and ask the Secretary to read a letter which I have received this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

148 WEST EIGHTEENTH STREET,
Los Angeles, Cal., August 21, 1918.

Senator THOMAS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Noticing from newspaper reports statements of loyalty of organized labor, and their objections to being included in war regulations, leads me to write of the following incident, the date of which was August 16.

I signed up as a machinist at the Los Angeles shipyard and reported as directed on the night shift. While waiting to be given work was asked by a workman to show a union card, and told that no one could work in the shop unless a member of the union; that all foremen and workmen were such; and that I absolutely could not work there unless I agreed to become a member.

Upon stating this to the foreman, he said that "he could not mix in the matter but would give me a job if I wanted it." As I could not conscientiously join an organization practicing methods of intimidation and interference, I did not attempt to work, but left the shipyard and gave up my efforts to use my experience to help out in the most necessary work.

Will state further that I am above the maximum limit of the new draft law, and would probably not be acceptable in Army or Navy, but that ability to give good service in private shops led me to desire to follow the request of our President and make my efforts count directly in the Nation's work.

Respectfully,
EDMUND J. BOWERS.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I think that the statement just read from this workman is quite informing and quite eloquent, coming as it does from a man who lives with these conditions, as to the situation and as to the attitude of the rank and file of men engaged in laboring in war industries in so far as they are affected by the amendment of the Senator from Colorado. I know that some of the leaders of certain labor unions are opposed to this amendment and have been quite actively agitating against it. The methods which are used sometimes by leaders of labor unions are rather graphically described by the experience of this man whose letter has just been read; but, if left to a free decision, I do not believe that a majority or any substantial portion of the laboring men of this country ask for any special privilege or exemption as compared with other men within the draft age as to their military service. I think that most of them, a great majority of them, being patriotic citizens, would resent the attempt on the part of certain of their leaders to put them into a privileged class, to send their fellows to the front, to relieve them from the duty of going to the front, and then allow them to quit work and remain idle if they please, and so escape altogether the highest obligations of citizenship. I do not think they want it, and there will undoubtedly be means by which the question can be put to the mass of labor and not left to the decision of a few leaders of union labor.

A day or two ago in one of the newspaper articles published daily by a certain correspondent here in the city of Washington, who occupies the position apparently of being the regular defender of everything that is being done in the conduct of the war by those who are at present responsible for it, a statement was made that the proposed amendment of the Senator from Colorado made no substantial change in the law. This writer, whose articles are generally printed on the front page of the paper, said that the law already provided the same thing that the amendment of the Senator from Colorado provides, and, on account of the official sanction which this newspaper writer has apparently, that statement of his as to the effect of this amendment on the present law has found very wide acceptance, even in the Senate, and it has been assumed by some, perhaps without investigating the question, that the amendment of the Senator from Colorado was rather superfluous and had no substantial effect. Mr. President, that is far from being the case. The law at the present time is not at all as provided in the amendment of the Senator from Colorado. All that is necessary to demonstrate the fact that the amendment of the Senator from Colorado will accomplish a vital and, in my opinion, a necessary change in the war conditions of the country is to look around the country and see the conditions that exist.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What will be the effect if the amendment is defeated?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Well, if it is defeated it will lead to confusion, to loss and waste of labor, and will perpetuate the injustices and discriminations as between citizens as to the duties which are exacted from them in the war that exist now. If, however, it is passed, and if, when it becomes a law it is enforced, those conditions will be remedied by this amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if this amendment is defeated, whether the potency and purpose of the present law will have been in any manner impaired by an adverse vote? Suppose the amendment of the Senator from Colorado is voted down, and the sense of the Senate then appears to be against the construction placed upon the law by the author of the amendment, what becomes of the insistence of those who believe that the intention of the present law was to effectuate the very purpose which the amendment had in mind? That, I frankly say, disturbs me somewhat. I want every man either to work or fight; I think that is a good principle.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will answer the Senator's question fully. Every man ought either to work or fight. If the amendment of the Senator from Colorado is adopted every man will have to work or fight who comes within the limits prescribed by the law as to age and classification. If the amendment of the Senator from Colorado is defeated, every man within those ages and classifications will not have either to work or fight, because the law then in that respect will be the same as it is now.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. He could be made to fight.

Mr. POINDEXTER. But he is not made to fight, and he does not have to be made to fight, because the law does not require it; that is the point I am trying to make; whereas if this amendment is passed the law will require it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Before the Senator interrupts me further allow me to demonstrate that. Here is a statement of conditions existing under the present law—a very recent statement, dated August 22, from Newport News:

> Approximately 2,000 plumbers employed on Government work at the various operations in the Hampton Roads district have gone on strike for an increase in pay of from 75 cents to 87½ cents an hour, thus tying up work at a score of places.

That is the present condition—

> The plumbers employed on Government work—> in this district three weeks ago were granted a wage increase by the adjustment board of from 72½ cents per hour to 75 cents per hour. This was not satisfactory, and the plumbers then put in a demand for 87½ cents per hour, double time for Sundays and Saturdays after 11 a. m. and double time for every hour after 4 o'clock each week day.

On Government work—

> The work affected by the strike embraces the operations at Camp Abraham Eustis, Camps Morrison and Hill, Hilton Village, Shipping Board apartment houses, hospitals at Camp Stuart, Langley Aviation Field, and Fort Monroe on this side of Hampton Roads. On the other side the places affected include the naval base, Bush Bluff, quartermaster terminals, and Pig Point.
> The increase asked by the men is to apply as of June 1, if granted.

There is the situation at the most important center or ganglion of the nerves of the war activities of the country, which is paralyzed, because men who have been drafted, who are within the draft age, but were exempted to work as plumbers, refuse to accept the award as to wages and conditions that was allowed them by the Government Wage Adjustment Board, which contains as a part of its members some of the leading representatives of organized labor in the country, such as Mr. Walsh, who made the famous report as to industrial conditions a few months ago.

To connect that up with the question of the Senator from Michigan that condition exists, while the fellow-citizens of these same men are sent to the front trenches in France and are glad to go and give the utmost labor of which they are capable, and proud to give their lives, if necessary, as the highest function which a citizen can perform. While they are doing this, not knowing how long they may live, their brothers under the existing law go on strike, as has been described in this article. If the amendment of the Senator from Colorado is agreed to, that condition can not exist. That is the difference between the two. It exists now because there is no law which prevents it; and there is no lawyer or anybody else who can controvert that statement. I ought to add, however, in order to be full about the matter, that there is a law which could prevent it if the President of the United States would exercise his authority under it; but the President of the United States has not exercised his authority under the law. The difference between the existing law and the one proposed is that under the latter the Senate exercises the authority. It does not leave it to any executive discretion. The difference is between an opportunity to act and acting, which is a very substantial difference. It is the difference between merely having authority to do a thing and doing it.

Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. SMITH of Michigan, and Mr. WATSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It may interest the Senator from Washington to know that information was given to the Committee on Military Affairs, in discussing this very matter with the Secretary of War, that the present provision of law which was directed along this line, as the Senator will remember, is, according to his testimony, enforced from time to time against an individual, but not against a collection of individuals.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; with the result I have referred to.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is all a matter of regulation.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do.

Mr. WATSON. I should like to ask my friend from Washington to make a little clearer the distinction. That is to say, there is a law now that, if enforced, would prevent such conditions as he very aptly describes. What assurance has the Senator, however, that if the other law were passed that law would be enforced?

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Let me answer the Senator from Indiana first.

Mr. WATSON. While the Senator is answering that question I should be glad to have him answer this further question, if he pleases: He has said that the President could enforce the existing law if he chose to do so, but that the Senate can enforce the law proposed by the Senator from Colorado. I do not understand how the Senate can enforce a law.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not know that I used that language. If I did, I was not very happy in my expression. The Senate can require action, and that is what Congress would be doing if it passed the law. Of course, the carrying out of the law must be left to some executive official.

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The law is not as the Senator from Indiana assumed in his statement, or at least as I understood him to assume. It does not require anybody at all to put a stop to this condition at Hampton Roads, or other similar conditions. There is no requirement of law that the President shall act there. He has discretion; that is all. He can act if he sees fit; whereas if this law passes he will not have discretion about it, but it will be one case in which the legislative branch of the Government assumes a portion of the authority which it was intended it should assume, and decides the policy of the Government.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. It strikes me that the matter is in exactly the same situation as the liquor question. By the law that we passed at the last session of Congress we gave the President power to regulate the liquor traffic by prohibiting the use of cereals in the manufacture of liquor. He has not exercised that power; and now we propose to cover it by this amendment to the Agricultural appropriation bill and make it specific.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think that is a very happy illustration of the situation.

Mr. NELSON. And it is the same in this case. We have given the President the general power, and, undoubtedly, while it has only been exercised in individual cases, he could exercise it extensively to prevent a strike in the way I have indicated. But now we are seeking to do in this matter as we are seeking to do in the liquor question—make it mandatory instead of leaving it to the discretion of the executive department, where we fear that that discretion will not be exercised as effectively as it ought to be.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; that is an accurate statement of the law as I understand it, and it shows the utter difference in conditions that will exist between the law as proposed and the law existing now. Under the law existing now, these men striking do so with impunity and yet escape military service; and no public official, neither the President nor anybody else, is violating any law in permitting them to do so. If this law is passed, that can not be permitted without a violation of the law.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to his colleague?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I can not construe the law as it is now suggested by the Senator from Minnesota, or as suggested by my colleague. I want to call his attention to it. It seems to me that the amendment of the Senator from Colorado gives more warrant to the President to allow conditions to continue as they are now than the existing law does. Here is the existing law:

> The President is hereby authorized to exclude or discharge from said selective draft and from the draft under the second paragraph of section 1 hereof, or to draft for partial military service only from those liable to draft as in this act provided, persons of the following classes.

And then it describes these classes. Now, the President is authorized to exclude them; but we go on then and make this positive legislative provision:

> No exemption or exclusion shall continue when a cause therefor no longer exists.

That is absolutely prohibitive, so far as legislation can prohibit. We do not even authorize the President to make rules and regulations prescribing how to determine when this cause for exemption exists, but we make a positive legislative declaration that no exemption or exclusion shall continue when the cause for such exclusion ends. The amendment of the Senator from Colorado provides that they shall not be entitled to be exempt when the cause for exemption ceases, but it goes on further and expressly authorizes the President to make rules and regulations for enforcing it. Any rules and regulations that the President may make will be made pursuant to the act if we adopt the amendment, and it seems to me—I may be mistaken—that under that he can do what he is doing now and point to the law to justify him in doing it. It seems to me as the law is now that the responsibility for enforcing the law and making it possible that these exemptions shall not continue when the cause therefor ceases rests with the administrative branch of the Government, and that we can hold them responsible, but that if we adopt this amendment providing for these rules and regulations we expressly give them warrant to make such rules and regulations as will permit the very conditions to exist that the Senator and I both admit exist now.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. POINDEXTER. In just a moment I will yield to the Senator.

I do not think there is really any very substantial difference between the statement of the law and the amendment of my colleague and myself, although the conclusions we draw from them are somewhat different. The proviso in the amendment that he refers to—that "the President shall make regulations"—is limited by the words that immediately follow—"for enforcing this provision." The only regulations that the President can make are regulations for enforcing the provision. At the present time he is not required to enforce any such provision at all.

It may be well to illustrate further just what is involved in this tie-up of war work at the naval base at the Jamestown Exposition site, the navy yard at Hampton, and the various Government activities of the Quartermaster's terminal at Norfolk, and the various war activities surrounding Hampton Roads, which is perhaps the greatest port in the country at this time for the shipment of supplies and munitions and the transport of troops. These men there, before the controversy arose, were receiving $150.80 a month, counting a month as 26 working days, at 8 hours a day. They were paid by the hour, and at that rate it would amount to $150.80 a month, which they were getting before the controversy arose. They demanded $172 a month for 26 days, at 8 hours a day. The matter was submitted to the Wage Arbitration Board, and the Wage Arbitration Board allowed them $156 a month, and because they are unwilling to work 8 hours a day, 26 days in the month, for $156, they go on strike, regardless of the effect it may have upon the supplying and feeding of our troops in Europe, or of the effect which it may have upon the outcome of the battles which are raging now on the battle front in France.

Just at the same time there was going on a strike of firemen in Pittsburgh. I read this newspaper clipping on the subject:

PITTSBURGH, August 25.

Every fireman of the 1,000 who resigned from the city's service at noon yesterday was back at his station in uniform at 6 o'clock last night—

Why did they come back? In the first place, a great fire had broken out which threatened munition plants and threatened the existence of a large portion of the city. These firemen were on strike, refusing to submit their claims or to abide their strike until a decision could be had from the board which was provided by the Government for a judicial consideration of differences of this kind; and the fire was combated by volunteers and by soldiers who had been called away from their homes and their families and their business for nothing practically, because the pay of a soldier is not compensation in any sense of the word. It is merely based upon the idea of maintenance, of supporting him. He gets no pay in a commercial sense. He gives his services; he gives himself. These firemen, who were receiving good pay, had a controversy about wages which they were unwilling to submit to a board whose fairness I never have heard questioned. They were on strike and the safety of the city and the munitions plants so necessary to the Government was preserved by the soldiers and by volunteer citizens—

Officials of the Federal War Labor Board in Washington told the virtual strikers late in the afternoon that they must return to work.

Immediate arrest by the military of every man who failed was the alternative.

This action was taken shortly after 300 student soldiers from the reserve officers' training camp at Carnegie Tech had won a battle with flames that destroyed several houses in Penn Avenue and threatened to spread to a munitions plant of the Westinghouse electric concern.

I only mention those as illustrations out of hundreds that might be selected throughout the country, some of which are existing at the present time in my own State. I have a telegraphic dispatch here of August 26, as follows:

Following the breaking off of negotiations last night between representatives of the Pacific Coast Steel Co. and employees of the company engaged on contracts for the Emergency Fleet Corporation a strike was declared at 7 o'clock to-day. The employees declared that more than 1,000 workers went out. They demand pay and working conditions similar to those in effect in the shipyards.

I have not the details of the wages. Some of the men in the shipyards are earning as high as $20 a day. The men in these steel plants are earning the largest wages they ever earned in their lives. Their wages are commensurate with the expenses of living, and they are living better than they ever lived before. I do not know the details of their grievance. Assume that there is merit to their claim: There is a wage board for the adjustment of it. They refused to abide by the decision of that board. They care nothing, apparently, for the effect of their refusal to work—although they have been exempted for that purpose from military service—upon the outcome of the war or the safety and independence of the country. For the purpose of remedying those conditions, whatever certain leaders of organized labor may say, however they may interpose their political influence against the enactment of this measure which has been proposed by the Senator from Colorado, I propose to vote for it, because it is right, it is just, and union labor itself, which is just and which is patriotic, will vindicate the adoption of this amendment when it has an opportunity to consider it fairly and without undue influence.

Now, it is proposed by authority apparently, the executive authority, to defeat this amendment, if we are to judge by the statements of semiofficial newspaper writers to whom I referred a moment ago. For what reason? Not because it is wrong. I see in the papers here that the administration admits it is right, and the only argument which they make against it is that it is unnecessary, which I had undertaken to discuss a little while ago. What is the reason this writer gives for the opposition of the administration to this amendment? The reason is that it might offend union labor. That is the reason they give. It seems to me to be a somewhat brazen admission of the influences which control here and there, but that is the statement. The significant words are that if this amendment should be considered a reflection upon labor it ought to be defeated. That is the reason given for defeating it, and at the same time it is proposed to allow existing conditions to continue while the war work of the Government shall be impeded by strikes from the Atlantic to the Pacific. I make the assertion that in all of these willful interferences with the production and shipment of food and munitions of war pro-German spies and traitors are at work contributing to that result, and succeeding in accomplishing that purpose, releasing and exempting from service at the front thousands and tens of thousands of men within the military age, and yet it is proposed, Senators, at the same time to go further than France—heroic, noble France—has gone, fighting upon her own soil, for her firesides and her altars; further than England has gone in four years of war, and conscript into the Army boys of 18 years of age. If it is necessary, if it can be proved by any reasonable showing to be necessary, I will vote to conscript boys of 16 and men of 60.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. But it is not necessary, and briefly I want to show why I do not think it necessary to draft boys of 18 and why the minimum age should be limited to 19 instead of 18. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator spoke about present conditions and cited some instances of strikes. Of course, the Senator will realize that those matters can not be remedied in a day. Even under this bill in any provision you might make a period of time would have to elapse before there could be a reclassification or a calling into the service. It may be that these conditions are only temporary.

Mr. POINDEXTER. How long does the Senator think would elapse or does he assume would elapse?

Mr. FLETCHER. I should not think it ought to extend over a great while.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Can the Senator give an approximate idea of the time?

Mr. FLETCHER. I should imagine that that would depend on conditions.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I say to the Senator I think that about 12 hours would be long enough. If the President of the United States sent word to Norfolk, Va., that these men who were on strike for $172 a month instead of the liberal pay allowed them by the wage board were not at work to-morrow morning, they would be called to serve in the Army in accordance with the registration which has already been made of them, it would be ended to-morrow morning. That is all the time that is necessary, and one order of that kind would be enough; there would be no necessity to repeat it anywhere in the United States.

Mr. FLETCHER. That leads me to the question I rose to propound to the Senator. The Senator's argument seems to proceed upon the idea that the workingmen within these ages who are engaged in essential industries are not disposed to enter the service at all. Does the Senator believe that these men are purposely endeavoring to avoid military service or that they would be unwilling to go into military service?

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; I think most of them are very patriotic. I think if it were left to them they would go into the military service or go to work; but it is not left to them. I know nothing about particular organizations. They are led by men whose judgment they defer to. Sometimes those leaders are right and sometimes they are wrong. I think the great mass of the men are patriotic, that their patriotism is of as high a percentage and of as high a standard as that of any other element in the country; but it does not make any difference what they want to do, I am talking about what they are doing. It does not make any difference what their motives are, the effect of their action is just the same.

It has been said by some that this would be a conscription of labor. It is not a conscription of labor at all. It is not a conscription of anything. They have already been conscripted. All the men who are affected by the amendment of the Senator from Colorado have already been conscripted. They have been registered; they have been listed; they are subject to military service. It applies only to those who are exempted from military service in order that they may engage in certain occupations prescribed in the act.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. The object of exempting these men from military service was to secure their services in industries where their labor was essential as experts or otherwise. This amendment, it seems to me, would result disastrously unless we assume that when the exemption is attempted to be set aside they go back to work rather than go into the Army, because their position in these industries is quite as essential as their place would be in the Army. Does the Senator believe that men would go back into the factories rather than to go into the Army under this rule?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I suppose there would be different actions in that regard; but it would adjust itself. I do not agree with the Senator that industrial work is on the same plane as military service. I think military service at the front is the highest class of service in every way.

Mr. BORAH. In a sense, of course, it is the highest; but the other is quite as indispensable to the situation, because the men can not be maintained upon the front either with munitions or with food without this work. So it is indispensable to the situation.

The reason why I ask the question is this: I was talking with a party who is opposed to this amendment and somewhat closely associated with the Government, and he was of the opinion that it would have a demoralizing effect for the reason that these men might prefer to go into the Army, and it is just as essntial to keep these industries going as it is to keep the Army at the front; that these men by reason of their expertness, on account of their especial fitness for this work have been exempted to do this work, and while sometimes disturbances arise and strikes occur, it is much better to deal with the situation so as to keep them there if possible rather than to deal with it in a way which might cause disturbance and a refusal to remain at work.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not think that any sufficient number of them would voluntarily give up their work under conditions which will be fixed by the wage adjustment board and go to the front in such numbers that their places could not be filled.

Mr. FALL and Mr. CUMMINS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FLETCHER in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator from New Mexico rose first, and I yield to him.

Mr. FALL. The amendment we are now discussing deals with a certain class in the draft law affecting those between 21 and 31. There are three classifications.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Five.

Mr. FALL. There are three classifications made in paragraph 4 of the original draft act.

Mr. POINDEXTER. But under the regulations of the department.

Mr. FALL. There are five, but those classifications were not made in the act.

If the Senator will permit me, the point which I desire to make is this: The amendment as reported which we have discussed refers to only one of the classes out of the three classes made by Congress. I am not referring to the five classes of drafted men as made by the department. There are certain exemptions:

That the Vice President of the United States, the officers, legislative, executive, and judicial, of the United States and of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, regular or duly ordained ministers of religion, students who at the time of the approval of this act are preparing for the ministry in recognized theological or divinity schools, and all persons in the military and naval service of the United States shall be exempt from the selective draft herein prescribed; and nothing in this act contained shall be construed to require or compel any person to serve in any of the forces herein provided for who is found to be a member of any well-recognized religious sect or organization at present organized and existing and whose existing creed or principles forbid its members to participate in war in any form and whose religious convictions are against war or participation therein in accordance with the creed or principles of said religious organizations, but no person so exempted shall be exempted from service in any capacity that the President shall declare to be noncombatant.

That is the first classification made by Congress. The amendment under discussion, it can not be maintained, affects that classification. Then there is the second classification, and this is what I desire to call the attention of the Senator particularly to. Here is the alternative:

And the President is hereby authorized to exclude or discharge from said selective draft and from the draft under the second paragraph of section 1 hereof, or to draft for partial military service only from those liable to draft as in this act provided, persons of the following classes.

The President can exercise his authority in two ways and two ways alone. He is absolutely precluded by the terms of the act itself from drafting for combat military purposes those in the following classification; he can only draft them in any way for semimilitary purposes:

County and municipal officials; customhouse clerks; persons employed by the United States in the transmission of the mail; artificers and workmen employed in the armories, arsenals, and navy yards of the United States, and such other persons employed in the service of the United States as the President may designate.

Mr. POINDEXTER. What point is the Senator making?

Mr. FALL. With the permission of the Senator, I thought he was under the impression that the amendment which we are now discussing applied to all those under registration.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Oh, no; I said it would apply to some of those under registration. I said "all that it applied to are under the registration."

Mr. FALL. Then it certainly does not apply and could not apply to the classes to prevent a strike in a ship yard or navy yard or munition factories operated by the United States Government. It does not affect those people at all, nor can the President draft those people engaged in the munitions factories.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not agree with that construction of the act. The registration which is provided for by the act is——

Mr. FALL. If the Senator will just allow me, I will close in just a second.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It includes all persons between the ages of 18 and 45.

Mr. FALL. This amendment which we are discussing in terms itself only applies to persons engaged in industries, including agriculture. That is the third class, and it only applies to the third class of those registered. It does not apply at all either to the first or the second class.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That may be true, but that is not involved in what I was speaking of. The point I was making was that all people affected by that amendment are not going to be drafted under it as claimed; they were drafted when they were registered.

Mr. FALL. That is exactly the proposition I am making. They are not drafted at all under the act of Congress itself.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I beg the Senator's pardon. They are required to register and are subject by the law to such disposition as the law provides. They become a part of the military forces of the country, and for reasons of State it is deemed wise to excuse them from the military service in order that they may work in essential industries.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. The point to which I wanted to call the attention of the Senator from Washington was under consideration by him a few minutes ago. He was comparing the inclination of working men to go into the Army as opposed to remaining at industrial labor. I have no doubt the working men of this country are just as patriotic, and the Senator has no doubt of it, as any other class of citizens. But here is the point: Assuming that the Thomas amendment goes unmodified into law, these men are classified. They are put in a deferred classification because their labor is necessary to the maintenance of the Army. They strike, for instance, or cease to work in a concerted way, and we will assume for a good reason, and they instantly lose that classification under the Thomas amendment. Most of them have dependents and would be deferred on that ground alone, although they are not so classified. If those men are willing to continue to work until the War Labor Board decides their dispute, and are willing to continue to work in the meanwhile, and then abide by the decision of the War Labor Board, is it fair to put workingmen with dependents in class 1 or subject to the draft as is expressed in the amendment? Ought not some provision at least to be made for the support or maintenance of their dependents if they are to lose the classification which they have received on account of the essential character of their labor?

All my amendment provides is simply that they are not to lose this classification if they are willing to submit their dispute and do continue to work in the meanwhile and thereafter in accordance with the decision.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think there is a good deal of merit in the Senator's proposition. I have not seen the last form of the amendment, but it occurs to me that if the conditions are as the Senator states, if the men do not quit work pending the decision of the wage-adjustment board, but continue at work, and after the decision abide by its decision and continue at work, then the amendment of the Senator from Colorado would have no application to them at all. There is no question that would arise about those men. But even if so, the matter of the ground upon which they are exempted, whether they are exempted as laborers in essential industries or exempted because of dependents, is a matter of adjustment. If they claim exemption on some other ground, of course the amendment of the Senator from Colorado would have no application to them at all, because it refers only to exemptions upon this ground.

Mr. CUMMINS. I doubt very much whether under the amendment of the Senator from Colorado or the committee amendment, if it is not modified, the workingmen who fall within the Thomas amendment could claim an exemption or deferment on the ground of dependents. In fact, I do not think they could.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I differ with the Senator.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to his colleague?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield for a question.

Mr. JONES of Washington. As I understand the proposal of the Senator from Iowa it is that if these laborers should contemplate a strike because of dissatisfaction with the terms and conditions of their employment and agree to submit their dispute with their employers to some sort of a board of arbitration, when the board renders its decision they are willing to accept it, but the employer in effect does not accept it, then they can strike without being subject to the Thomas amendment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I understood that was the purpose, but I hope Senators will not undertake a discussion of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa at this time. I desire to conclude.

Mr. CUMMINS rose.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. I beg pardon of the Senator from Washington. I only wanted to call attention to the fact that, however patriotic workmen may be—and I think that they are patriotic as are any other body of citizens—it is a pretty hard alternative to put up to them to say, "If you cease work for a perfectly just reason, you must lose your chance for a deferred classification on account of dependents you may have in your family."

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; I agree with the Senator from Iowa; but I do not think that that would be the effect of the amendment.

I think the entire matter has been confused and obscured by some of the apparently inspired utterances in newspapers. Of course, these partisan correspondents are very able men, and their opinions are entitled to a great deal of weight. As a case in point, I notice a remarkable intellectual feat of the same writer who said that this amendment would make no change in the law. On yesterday in a column article, after reviewing the conditions at the front, citing cable dispatches and going in great detail into the information, to which he intimates he has had exclusive access, he has come to the conclusion—the profound judgment—that the Germans are not retreating voluntarily.

Mr. KENYON. Voluntarily?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes. With marines and other Americans jabbing them at Chateau-Thierry with bayonets, and Foch's Frenchmen covering them with 75-milimeter guns, on the left flank, and on the right—with their communications under fire, and their army bottled up and making a desperate effort to get out—this writer says, after a most able compilation of figures and facts, that "every examination of cabled and mail reports from the other side leads to the judgment that the German withdrawal is by no means voluntary." Now, you have got to pay some respect to a man who is capable of intellectual feats of that kind.

Mr. President, I want to say just a word as to the minimum of the age classification for compulsory military service. I have always been in favor of universal military training, which is quite a different thing from military service. If I could accomplish it, I should like to see the United States Government, as a measure of self-protection, begin at least a medical examination of children in the schools, in order to see where their physical condition, upon which depends largely their mental and moral condition, could be benefited; and to have inaugurated at the age of 16 or 17, or even younger, some form, some wise plan of training for their development, to equip them better for the duties of citizenship and make them capable of more valuable military service, so that in case of an emergency they would be available to the Government. But that is a very different thing from taking the young boys and sending them to the front. Military training is radically different from military service.

This bill proposes to take boys of 18 years of age and to put them in the same class with boys of 21 and 22 years of age, subject to be sent immediately, if the military authorities so decide, to the battle front. As I said before, if that were necessary I would gladly support it, but I want to inquire for a moment as to whether or not it is necessary.

There seems to be a misapprehension in some quarters over the proposition that it is alleged that the military authorities have stated that a boy of 18 years of age makes the best soldier. That has been repeated time and time again, but with the respect which we have and ought to have for expert opinion, which has had profound weight in this body, I do not find that the military authorities have ever said any such thing. On the contrary, the military authorities fixed 19 years of age as the minimum age of the draft when the first draft law was passed, when they were acting freely and selecting what they considered the very elite of the military strength of the country. In the hearings before the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], a member of the committee, asked this question of Gen. Crowder, the Provost Marshal General:

> Senator REED. You do know, however, that the War Department, speaking broadly, has been a consistent advocate from the first of beginning to draft with boys 18 years old, and its original plan was to draft from 18 to 25, was it not?
> Gen. CROWDER. 19 to 25 or 26.

There is the answer of the War Department as to its opinion in reference to the minimum at which efficiency in the case of the man power of the country in a military sense is reached, and it corresponds with the military experience of our allies. The French have considered that to put into their battle line boys 18 years old instead of strengthening their army would weaken it; so have the British. Many of the German soldiers and officers attribute their defeat in the recent disaster which they have met with in France to the fact that they had so many young soldiers in their ranks, many of them boys 18 years of age. Common sense and universal human experience are as valuable teachers in a question of this kind as is military science. Senators are men of mature judgment, men of experience in all the relations of life, and I should like any one of you to consider if as the commander of an army you were confronted with the proposition of going into a fight against another army equally well led and well equipped and of the same numbers, and you had your choice as to the age of your soldiers and could determine the age of the enemy, would you choose an army of boys 18 years of age to fight an army of men of 19, 20, and 21 years of age? I believe that, all things being equal, men of 20, 21, and 22 almost certainly would defeat an equal opposing force of boys of 18.

It would be a good deal like taking a high-school football team and expecting it to play a match game with a university football team. That is about what the proposition would be. Common sense and common experience dispute it, and the War Department in their authoritative utterances have never advocated it on the basis that boys of 18 make the best soldiers.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Has the Senator stated how many men it would take out of those subject to the draft if the age were raised from 18 years to 19 years?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have not stated that, but, according to the estimate—and we have nothing but estimates—it would take 660,000.

Now, I want to comment upon the effect of that. It is a very pertinent and relevant question.

According to the same estimates made by the same authorities there are plenty of men left in the draft of the other ages to more than make up the force which the War Department proposes to organize, and that, Mr. President, without going beyond the first class; that is, without infringing a particle upon classification No. 2.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just a moment. Let us see what classification No. 2 is. Here is one of the elements that go to make up class 2 under the draft according to the regulations of the War Department, and the men included would be entitled to deferred classification:

(a) Married men with children or father of motherless children, where such wife or children or such motherless children are not mainly dependent upon his labor for support for the reason that there are other reasonably certain sources of adequate support (excluding earnings or possible earnings from the labor of the wife) available, and that the removal of the registrant will not deprive such dependents of support.

There are a large number of men who have not been reached under the present law and who are not proposed to be taken under the bill now pending who are described in the classification which I just read, men who have children who are not dependent upon them for support, but who have other means of support—substantially stated. For my part, I would prefer to invade that element of the second class and take those men before I would go below 19 and take boys of 18.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. Does not the Senator know that the present plan contemplates a deferred classification for all married men?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I thought that had been disputed. There is nothing in the law to that effect.

Mr. STERLING. It has not been disputed, but it has been asserted over and over again on the floor of the Senate that the plan does contemplate such deferred classification, and I think that the figures in the report of the committee, figures furnished, I presume, by Gen. Crowder——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Are based upon that.

Mr. STERLING. Are based upon that.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That only strengthens my proposition. If that is the case; if every married man is going to be put in a deferred class and not drawn at all, it is all the more reason why many married men in such situation ought to be drawn and put in the Army before, in my opinion, the extreme youthful age to which I have referred is taken.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator stated a moment ago that by raising the minimum age of those subject to the draft to 19 it would yield all the troops that the plans of the War Department contemplated.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What is the number that the Senator understands the War Department plan does contemplate, in round numbers?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will state that to the Senator. The plan of the War Department contemplates, in round numbers, 80 divisions.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of 40,000 men each?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Of 40,000 men each; which would amount to 3,200,000. Added to the 3,200,000 the 18 divisions of 720,000 men which the War Department proposes to have in the United States and not send abroad, would make, under the plan of the War Department, 3,920,000 men, including—I emphasize again—18 divisions, aggregating 720,000 men, to be retained in the United States.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Now, what I was going to ask the Senator was this: The present plan of the War Department may contemplate the raising of only 3,200,000 men, or, with the extras to be kept in the United States, in the neighborhood of 4,000,000 men. The Senator has alluded to the fact that the central powers attribute in some measure their recent reverses to the fact that their men are too young, their ages going down into 17 or 18. I suggest to the Senator, if men of 18 are drafted, it may well be that they will not get into the line of battle for a year, at which time they will be 19. They must be trained both here and abroad before they fight in actual warfare; and would it not be wise to have this extra force that would come from taking the men of 18 years of age? In any event, if we should have enough without taking them, is it not well to have a margin of surplus for contingencies and to have an overwhelming force?

As to the efficiency of men of 18 years of age, if it is true that the Germans count one of their weaknesses the fact that they have had in the line men of 18 years of age, our men of 18 would be as good as theirs, and would not constitute a weakness in our Army, but would give a surplus to our Army as good as a large part of the German Army. In that view of it, it seems to me it would be an element of strength.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Even if our men should be as good as theirs, there would be no reason why we should not have men better than theirs.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Well, if our Army is better, except those of 18, and they are equally as good, it seems to me we shall have increased the strength of our Army by taking men of 18.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I would agree instantly with the Senator as to the proposition of having the younger men in reserve and trained in the United States if the entire complement that it is proposed by the military authorities to organize can not be gotten from the classes of 19 years of age and older, and I would, if necessary, even go below 18, because men have served in armies even younger than that, but it is not necessary. We have 1,500,000 men in France now and we have 1,500,000 in the United States, making 3,000,000. Under the classifications between the ages of 32 and 45 it is estimated by Gen. Crowder that he will get of what he calls effectives, after the most liberal rules of elimination and exemption, allowing 30 per cent elimination for physical defects, 601,236 men, and between the ages of 19 and 21, or the two years of 19 and 20, 1,100,000 men, which makes 1,701,000 men, in addition to those that we already have, without touching the 18-year-old class.

Now, if we send those men to France it will take us more than a year, at the rate of 300,000 a month, to get them to France, and that is without touching any of those in the second classification; it is leaving out of the question the addition to the Army of any of these men who have been exempted in order to work and who have quit work; it is leaving out of the question the combing over of the registration lists, which everybody knows could be done, with the result that hundreds of thousands of physically fit men, and men who in every other way are eligible for military service, could be added to our fighting forces. We see them cluttering the halls of executive offices. We find a great number of those men who are counted in the 1,500,000 soldiers that are now in the United States not doing a soldier's work. We have them in the State of Washing, getting out spruce timber—trained military officers who do not know anything about spruce, and whose places could be taken in spruce work by men whose lives have been spent in that business. These men who are trained to fight, and I will say who want to fight, who are eager to go to the front, but who can not go to the front and can not go there because they are put in this industrial occupation, could be taken out and our armies strengthened to that extent.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I assume that a good many men are in this country for the reason stated by the Senator—that the means for transporting them to France are not yet available. When the Senator states that we have a million and a half men in France I think he should bear in mind that only one-third of that force is effective on the firing line.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I suspect so.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And if we have a surplus in this country to draw upon, the Senator must also remember that our shipbuilding and ship-launching facilities are increasing rapidly and that the great preliminary work of adapting our yards and getting the materials to build these ships has been done; the foundation has been laid; and we must expect that by the time these men are fit to be transported to the training camps abroad there will be ships enough to greatly increase the monthly number that can be transported abroad.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I doubt very much whether it will be increased very much above 300,000 a month. I do not know. It might be, but the more men we get to France the more tonnage is required to supply them. Some estimates are as high as 8 tons per man for supplying them, which increases in proportion to the number of men in France.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I would not attempt to dispute with the Senator upon that question, or to assert anything positively, because I have not the original sources of information, and I am not myself an expert in the business; but I understood from what I had seen in the newspapers that both the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff had testified before the Committee on Military Affairs that they were assured that they would be amply able to supply an army of 4,000,000 men in Europe by the 1st of next July, and unless the British withdraw their ships which we are now using to transport about 50 to 60 per cent of those that are transported abroad, we should be amply able, unless they are utterly mistaken in their estimates and statements, to maintain the Army.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think that the statement which I made on this subject is borne out by the testimony of these military authorities that the Senator from Connecticut quotes. In the first place, notwithstanding the general impression that has been created, and which I had myself, I find on looking at the record that the War Department does not intend to have an army of 4,000,000 in France. I thought they did, but they do not. Here is the testimony of the Secretary of War. He says:

> After the recess of Congress the study went on, and a few days ago—

This is the testimony given recently before the Military Affairs Committee—

> It became clear to us that * * * the 80-division program was perhaps the maximum which we could possibly hope to accomplish.

Eighty divisions in France.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But the Senator must remember that even the War Department is subject to being educated from time to time, and is capable of changing its opinion after the one previously held has been demonstrated to be erroneous. If it were not for that, our case would, indeed, be hopeless.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have observed that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not know whether the Senator has correctly apprehended the position of the War Department. The War Department proposes to have 80 divisions in France, but 20 divisions in the United States.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Eighteen divisions in the United States.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, 18; I think that is correct. So that it is not an 80-division proposition; it is a 98-division proposition.

Mr. POINDEXTER. But it depends upon what basis you are discussing. We were speaking about the Army to go through the German lines, the Army in France. That is what we were speaking about; and I had the impression—I do not know whether any one else did or not—that when Gen. March said that an Army of 4,000,000 men could go through the German lines at any time they wanted to, he meant an army of 4,000,000 in Europe, because that is the only place where you can go through the German lines. You can not go through the German lines in the United States.

Now, Mr. President, there is another feature——

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. Before the Senator passes from that phase of the matter I should like to ask him a question. If a regulation were made under which the 18-year-old boys would not be called until the others had been called, would not that cover the objection he has? I call his attention to the testimony of the Secretary of War before the House committee, where he says:

> I therefore have planned from the beginning, as a matter of regulation, to have the men from 18 to 19 put in a separate class, calling them the class of 18-year-old men, with a view to deferring their call until it is necessary.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have thought a good deal about that proposition, and at first it seemed quite plausible; but I have come to the conclusion that it is impracticable and unwise, for the reason that the deferring of calling them in itself shows that it is not necessary to have them immediately; and not being necessary to have them immediately, it is an unwise policy to take them out of their schools and put them in the Army. I think the proposition contains in itself its own refutation.

Mr. KELLOGG. Is there not something in the point that we are now passing a draft law to provide for the maximum of men necessary that are going to be pledged to win this war, and that it is better to do it in one bill than to make several bites of the cherry?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Oh, I agree entirely with the Senator as to that, but I want to call his attention to this: If we were not going to get these boys of 18 for military service anyhow, in case they are needed—or, to state it differently, if the limitation of the minimum age to 19 in this bill would exclude forever that number of men from the Army—I would not be in favor of so limiting it. But the effect of limiting the minimum age to 19 years is simply—and I am satisfied that this phase of the matter, as obvious as it is, has been overlooked—is simply to defer upon an average of six months the calling into the military service of every one of these young men who are now 18 years of age. We do not lose them. In six months from to-day, upon the average and by the law of averages, all young men in the United States that are 18 years old will be 19 years old. That is the average period for the entire number. Some will become 19 to-morrow, some day after to-morrow; and they will be eligible upon becoming 19 years of age and subject to the plan, which is pointed out by Gen. Crowder in these hearings as being perfectly feasible, which he said could be carried out without difficulty, of a weekly registration of the men arriving at the required age—at present 21 years of age—if the President should make an order for the weekly registration of them. So, if the minimum age is fixed at 19 years, you would have every one of these younger men, now 18 years of age, coming week by week into the military service when they arrive at the age of 19 and relieve us of what I think would be the unwise and, in some respects, the cruel step of taking from their families and from their schools boys who have just arrived at the age of 18 years. Let it go along during the year, and as they become 19 years of age, then they will come into the military forces of the country.

Mr. President, there is one other proposition to which I want to call attention that is somewhat interesting. I have examined this testimony pretty closely. There has been an impression here that during the recess of Congress a great deal of abstruse study of this bill has been made by the War Department, and that the delay in enacting it was more than compensated for by the benefits that came from the study, and that we have something here that is quite different from the proposition which my friend the chairman of the committee proposed before the Senate in July, before we took our recess. As a matter of fact, Mr. President, nothing of the kind has happened at all. No changes have been made. The chairman of the committee truly points out in his report that the bill upon which we are now about to vote is substantially and fundamentally the same as that which was before the Congress heretofore. We have gained nothing by the delay, but we have lost six weeks of precious time, which we can never recover, and in the interest of the truth of history I speak of it now.

In view of the charge that has been made about Congress delaying things, I believe that when the Senator from Oregon came from the Committee on Military Affairs and proposed that the draft age should be extended to 45 and down to 19, the Senate would have voted for that proposition, which is the same as the one that is now pending, with the exception that 19 has been reduced to 18. The regulations for carrying out the law would have been made in the same identical way that they will have to be made now; and I want to fortify the statement which I am making as to the responsibility for the delay, and the effect of it, by reading from the testimony of the military authorities, including the Secretary of War.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to inquire if the Senator heard the statement which was made on the floor of the Senate the other day by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] regarding the reasons for the delay in the passage of this legislation?

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; I did not hear it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I understood the Senator from Nebraska the other day to make a statement which, to my mind, was thoroughly convincing that it would have been unwise to pass a half-baked proposition at the time it was presented for extending the draft ages.

Mr. POINDEXTER. What was the reason? If the Senator will repeat the reason, in substance, not at too much length, I should be much interested in hearing it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. If I correctly understood the Senator from Nebraska, he referred to very important negotiations which were pending between our Government and the Governments of our allies—negotiations which involved propositions not only of expediency but of limiting and defining in definite measure the part we should take in this war—and that it was necessary that those things be attended to, that there should be an understanding reached, before we committed ourselves to an extension of the draft ages; and the Senator from Nebraska gave explicit reasons, which I trust the Senator from Washington will take the trouble to read.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Was that the purpose for which the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] was sent to France by the President?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I have no knowledge as to the mission of the Senator from Illinois; but the statement made by the Senator from Nebraska the other day upon the floor was also made upon the floor of the Senate at the time the original idea was being discussed in this body, and the reasons then given were the same reasons as given by the Senator from Nebraska the other day, and to my mind to any Senator who wants to work in cooperation with the Commander in Chief of the Army the reasons given were wholly adequate to bring about anybody's conclusion that the action would have been unwise at the time.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have the reasons here from even a higher source in this particular matter than the Senator from Nebraska, as high as that may be, and I will read them to the Senator from New Mexico; but I am very much interested in his statement about these negotiations that induced the administration to suspend its military program while they were pending. Were they negotiations for peace? What was the general nature of these negotiations?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. As I understood the Senator from Nebraska, the negotiations related to the size of the army which we should put upon the front, the munitions that we should put there, the transportation facilities, and means for equipping our soldiers in France.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, that is substantially involved in the reason which I am going to give, that the administration had not determined whether or not the United States was going to do the best it could do in the war. That is the effect of the statement of the Senator from Nebraska, that it had not determined to what extent it would participate in the war.

The Senator said that patriotic men ought to want to follow and support the Commander in Chief. That is certainly true, with certain limitations; and in anything which the Commander in Chief does that can be supported without opposing the conduct of this war toward a victorious conclusion there is nobody who is going to be ahead of me in supporting him. But I want to say here and now that when the Senator from New Mexico states—as I infer, at least, is implied in his statement—that the President of the United States, at the time the proposal for an increase of the Army was pending here before the recess, was hesitating as to whether or not the Army should be increased, and carrying on negotiations to determine whether we would enter further into the war, and to what extent we would enter into it, I do not propose to follow him in such a policy as that.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I did not intend to express any such thought as the Senator now iterates with so much emphasis.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think that was necessarily implied.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I did not understand the Senator from Nebraska to make that statement. What I did mean to say was that I understood that arrangements had to be made in order to transport the troops, to furnish the men with the proper equipment, and other facilities which were requisite to getting the forces to the front. I am sure the Senator from Nebraska, who is present, can make the matter plain.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator will permit me.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am opposed to secret diplomacy. I should like to hear the whole thing.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There can possibly be no mistake about this, because I made on the floor of the Senate at the time the appropriation bill was before the Senate substantially the same statement that I make now. The representatives of the administration did not oppose increasing the draft-age limit. They merely asked that instead of putting it upon an appropriation bill before it was needed as a law it be deferred a few weeks until after the recess, for the reason that the Government was then in negotiations to develop how many divisions the United States should place upon the land in France during the next year. Already we had provided by the existing draft law at that time for all the soldiers we could transport to Europe and more, too, and the question was pending as to whether Great Britain could continue after the 1st of August to supply us with vessels to transport additional troops. Those negotiations had to be concluded before we could decide whether we would have 5,000,000 men to put in France next year.

Mr. POINDEXTER. My time is so limited that I should like to proceed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Those negotiations had to be settled before the administration could reach an intelligent conclusion as to the number of men to be added to those who were then available.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Every man will have to put his own interpretation upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair desires to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Senate is proceeding under the unanimous-consent rule, and that after 1 o'clock debate is limited to 10 minutes, and no Senator can speak more than once on an amendment and 15 minutes on the bill. The Chair, of course, will have to rule when an amendment is pending that the debate is on that amendment. The Senator from Washington has the floor.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That has never been the rule.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will proceed on the pending amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. A Senator might never have a right to speak for 15 minutes on the bill during the day under that ruling.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair can not determine whether a Senator refers to a bill or an amendment; but while an amendment is pending the debate will have to be limited to 10 minutes. The Chair will have to rule that he is speaking upon an amendment when an amendment is pending.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Now, to hurry on, I wish just to read to the Senate the reason why the Secretary of War opposed the extension of the draft age and the enlargement of the Army. On page 3 of the report on Calendar No. 506, the report of the Committee on Military Affairs, I find a statement from the Secretary of War on that subject, and he says:

> The need for the increase in the age limits is directly the outcome of the determination on the part of the War Department to speed up and also to increase in size the military program.

That is the reason. In other words, up to the 30th day of July—a year and four months after the United States was engaged in the war—the Secretary of War had not determined to speed up the military program, according to his own statement. The country can judge for itself. The particular date is mentioned on the next page, page 4 of this report, by Gen. March in his testimony before the committee, in these words, to be read and to be considered in connection with the statement on the preceding page by Mr. Baker. In saying this I am saying it without any partisan feeling of any kind at all, but simply because I am in favor of the vigorous prosecution of the war; and those who have retarded it, in the interest of justice ought to be held responsible to the country in a public way for their action. The blame ought not to be put on somebody else who is not responsible. Gen. March says:

> We reached the conclusion that the enlarged program was necessary on the 30th day of July, 1918.

A year and four months after war had been declared.

Now, Mr. President, that time can never be regained. The delay can never be recalled. Of course, that is a truism; but I do not take it with such equanimity as some Senators do. I understand the Senator from Nebraska rather defends the proposition that there was no need for hurry. That is the position of the Secretary of War. I think the loss of months of time when Gen. Haig was standing "with his back to the wall" calling on his men to stand and die in their tracks for the preservation of civilization—when they said of the military program of the United States, which is the hope of the allies, that there was no need for haste—that was wrong. It was committing a colossal blunder. It can not be repaired. We can not get back that time. We can not get the men who will be called under this draft to the front in a month of the time that they could have been gotten to the front if the law had been passed at that time. A month's delay, and who knows what a month may mean. It may be a month too late; it may be a week too late. And if it were but an hour too late, civilization might be lost because of that delay.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, when we took a recess last night there was some confusion of meaning in the amendment which I had proposed to the committee amendment, and I suggested that overnight I would endeavor to remove the confusion from the amendment. I ask now that the amendment pending be made to read as follows, and I will say that I have presented it to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], to whose amendment it applies, and while I am not permitted to say that he is in favor of it, he is clear that it has removed whatever contradiction there may have been in the form we were discussing last night.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment as modified will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the amendment heretofore offered, on page 8, line 12, after the word "draft" insert:

> This proviso shall not apply in the case of a strike if the strikers have submitted or will at once submit the dispute to the War Labor Board, agree to abide and do abide by its decision, and are willing at once to resume and continue work pending such decision. The said board shall take up and decide all such disputes as speedily as practicable.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no desire to continue the discussion upon the amendment. I said all I care to say about it yesterday afternoon. I ask only whether the yeas and nays were ordered on the amendment yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They have not been ordered.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask for the yeas and nays upon the amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Before that is done, my attention was diverted and I did not hear the amendment. I should like to have an opportunity to read it. [After a pause.]

Mr. TOWNSEND. Read it aloud.

Mr. BRANDEGEE (reading)—

This proviso shall not apply in the case of a strike if the strikers have submitted or will at once submit the dispute to the War Labor Board, agree to abide and do abide by its decision, and are willing at once to resume and continue work pending such decision. The said board shall take up and decide all such disputes as speedily as practicable.

I have no objection to the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there a second to the demand for the yeas and nays?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, agreeable to a promise I made that before the vote was taken I would suggest the absence of a quorum, I make that suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll on the question of a quorum.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Baird	Hale	New	Smith, Ga.
Bankhead	Henderson	Norris	Smith, Md.
Beckham	Hitchcock	Nugent	Smith, Mich.
Brandegee	Johnson, Cal.	Overman	Smoot
Calder	Johnson, S. Dak.	Owen	Sterling
Chamberlain	Jones, N. Mex.	Penrose	Sutherland
Colt	Kellogg	Phelan	Thomas
Culberson	Kendrick	Pittman	Townsend
Cummins	Kenyon	Poindexter	Trammell
Curtis	Kirby	Ransdell	Underwood
Dillingham	Lenroot	Robinson	Vardaman
Fall	Lodge	Saulsbury	Wadsworth
Fletcher	McCumber	Shafroth	Warren
France	McKellar	Steppard	Watson
Frelinghuysen	McNary	Sherman	Weeks
Gerry	Martin	Shields	Wolcott
Gulon	Nelson	Simmons

The PRESIDING OFFICE (Mr. FLETCHER in the chair). Sixty-seven Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Iowa if he will agree to a modification of his amendment in this respect: As it stands it states that the proviso "shall not apply in the case of a strike if the strikers have submitted or will at once submit the dispute to the War Labor Board, agree to abide and do abide by its decision, and are willing at once to resume and continue work pending such decision." It does not state how the willingness of strikers to resume work is to be ascertained, and it occurred to me that it would be improved if there should be added this clause to that language, to wit, to make it read:

And are willing at once to resume and continue work pending such decision, and do so resume and continue.

Mr. CUMMINS. Suppose the employer would not permit them to resume?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I assumed that a strike was a walkout against the employer and that the employer would be glad to have them return.

Mr. CUMMINS. In my opinion there would be but one way in which to show willingness to resume work and that would be to resume if the employer would permit the strikers to work, but the Senator from Connecticut of course does not want to put them completely at the mercy of the employer.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not, but inasmuch as the Senator states that the proviso shall not apply to a situation where the strikers are willing to return to work, it seems to me there ought to be a method provided for ascertaining their willingness or that they should actually go to work. Of course, as the Senator states, I do not want to place any man subject to the will of the employer, but when the Senator states that in his opinion the employer might not want these men to come back he is dealing with a lockout situation and not with a strike.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I think the criticism of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] is unanswerable. I would suggest the elimination of the words "are willing" so that it will read "agree to abide by its decision and to at once resume work."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is what I have in mind, or something like it.

Mr. THOMAS. The agreement would include going to work as well as submitting to arbitration, and by eliminating the words "are willing" I think that will be accomplished.

Mr. CUMMINS (to Mr. THOMAS). Please read it as suggested.

Mr. THOMAS. I will read it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the objection is a little hypercritical.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not think so.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am quite willing to make it conform to the purpose.

Mr. THOMAS. I suggest eliminating the words "are willing" and the word "to" and inserting that word before the word "at," so that it will read as follows:

This proviso shall not apply in the case of a strike if the strikers have submitted or will at once submit the dispute to the War Labor Board, agree to abide and do abide by its decision, and to at once resume—

That is, agree to at once resume—and continue work pending such decision.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, as far as I can do so I am willing to accept this amendment to the amendment which is now under consideration, not because it is entirely satisfactory, but because I am willing to make any reasonable concession which does not interfere with the purpose of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks it would not be in order for the Senator from Colorado to accept it, because it is no longer his amendment but a committee amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. The form that has just been suggested by the Senator from Colorado is wholly satisfactory to me. In my judgment it means the same thing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa, as modified in the way suggested.

Mr. NELSON. Let the amendment, as agreed upon, be read.

Mr. THOMAS. I understand the vote will be upon the amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read it.

The Secretary read as follows:

This proviso shall not apply in the case of a strike if the strikers have submitted, or will at once submit, the dispute to the War Labor Board, agree to abide and do abide by its decision, and to at once resume and continue work pending such decision. The said board shall take up and decide all such disputes as speedily as practicable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). The junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily absent to-day on account of illness in his family, and I have agreed to pair with him for to-day. Therefore I will withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote on the amendment to the amendment, I would vote "yea."

Mr. PENROSE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. By an arrangement with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], I will transfer that pair to my colleague [Mr. KNOX] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I am informed that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], with whom I have a general pair, if present, would vote "yea," and I am therefore at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair from the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] to the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] to the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH. My colleague [Mr. MYERS] is unavoidably absent and is paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (after having voted in the affirmative). I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and let my vote stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] is paired with the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS].

The result was announced—yeas 73, nays none, as follows:

So Mr. CUMMINS's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, 16 months ago I moved to amend the draft bill then before the Senate so as to raise the age limit to 21 years. The Senate committee, against my protest, had made the lowest draft limit 19 years. My amendment was adopted by the Senate and I believe it was approved by the country. If the same state of affairs confronted us again, I should again favor 21 years as the lowest age.

But, Mr. President, great changes have come since April of last year, and with changed conditions new issues are raised.

First of all, conditions abroad have changed. At that time Russia, though in revolution and operating under a provisional government, appeared to be still a great factor in the war on our side, with millions of soldiers in arms. Her attitude kept over a million German soldiers and nearly as many Austrian troops on the eastern front. The consequence was that Germany was hard pressed on the western front by the superior forces of France and Great Britain, which were making daily progress. It did not seem that it would be necessary, even if it might be feasible, for us to send a large army to Europe. Our plans at that time and for some months did not contemplate raising an army at the outside of more than 2,000,000 men.

Under those circumstances I strongly opposed drafting men less than 21 years of age. So did the Senate and so did the public sentiment of the country.

To take youths of less than 21 years of age and to leave at home young adults who were available for service was then, and would be now, contrary to public policy and obnoxious to public opinion.

We knew we could register nearly 10,000,000 men from 21 to 31 years of age. We knew that we could probably secure from this number enough available young men to raise the military strength of the country to any number then estimated to be necessary to end the war shortly.

All this, however, was changed by the collapse and disintegration of the Russian power in October of last year.

That was a stupendous disaster and completely changed the aspect of the war. It threw hundreds of thousands of additional Austrian soldiers upon the Italian front, and with the German help resulted in the Italian defeat, which placed a valuable part of north Italy in Austrian hands.

It abruptly put an end to British and French advances on the western front and drew a million or more German veterans from the Russian front to France and Belgium within 90 days.

It resulted in plans for a great German offensive, which actually took place in March of this year, and which threatened for a time to crush the allies before American armies could reach France in force.

It forced the United States to revise and enormously enlarge its war program and to resort to extreme measures.

Instead of an army of a million or a million and a half men, we have found it necessary to undertake the raising of 5,000,000 men, to say nothing of a Navy raised from less than one hundred thousand to half a million.

Obviously we can no longer pick and choose soldiers on sentimental lines. Stern necessity now confronts the country. Every male who can be spared must now be put on the available list if he is mentally, physically, and morally fit.

If he is a married man supporting a family he can not be spared as long as there are unmarried men not supporting families. If he is engaged in an essential industry and is himself essential to that industry, he can not be spared as easily as another in an unessential industry.

Obviously, also, the men selected must be those who can best stand the strain of war and who are least likely to break down and become hospital patients.

And so to increase our Army to 5,000,000 men we find it just as necessary now to require all between 18 and 45 to register as we found it sufficient last year to register those between 21 and 31 to get an Army then deemed sufficiently large.

In each case the process will be to accept for soldiers those who are most fit and who can be most easily spared. We must disturb and demoralize the essential industries of the country as little as possible. We must not take the necessary supports of families if it can be avoided. We must think not of the individual, but of the Nation. We must consult not our personal preferences or sentiments, but the stern needs of the case. We must consider what will produce the best Army and yet leave at home the most necessary men to support and sustain that Army.

As a Nation we are confronted with a great menace and are in the midst of a great world crisis. Not only must we from now on produce the greatest military man power of any nation on our side of the conflict, but we must help to finance our associate nations, help to feed them, and furnish to them much of the raw material and finished products that they require. This means that we must mobilize and conserve our man power at home. The men most valuable at home must be kept at home to support families or to work in essential industries.

The productiveness of the United States must be maintained at its highest point. This means not only the production of the soil and of the industries, but it means also the production of revenues derived from taxes and the production of credit derived from the sale of bonds. This can only be done by taking for military service those least needed in the field of production and business. To make the choice as broad as possible it is necessary at this time, in my opinion, to go as low as 18 years and as high as 45.

To my mind it is almost as important to success that the United States should avoid impairing its powers of production and supply as it is to furnish man power. We must furnish steel and copper and ships and food and lumber and transportation and ammunition and cotton and wool and sugar and coal and motors and hundreds of other products directly needed in the war, not only by ourselves, but by the allied nations. But more than that, we must furnish money and credit not merely for ourselves, but to some extent for them, and this can only be done by enormous taxes and equally enormous bond sales, and these are only possible while the country is prosperous and productive. To keep it prosperous and productive we must avoid taking men in essential or useful occupations who are important or essential to those occupations.

So we come back to the proposition that to raise our Army to 5,000,000 men we must make the search a broad one, going as low as 18 years and as high as 45.

Mr. President, in conclusion I shall refer to the impressive speech made in this Chamber a few days ago by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. Speaking for myself, I agree with him that we must have a great military triumph for our side as a basis for peace discussions. The power we are fighting is a military power. The system of Germany is essentially military. Nothing less than a great military disaster will burn into the mind of Germany the lesson she must learn if the world is to be made safe for democracy. The German people must become convinced that their system is wrong. They must be shown that the system of military autocracy built up and developed in 50 years is a failure. Nothing less than a great military defeat can bring this about. "He that lives by the sword shall perish by the sword." They must as a nation learn that lesson by experience. Argument will not do. The example of other nations is not enough. Only military disaster will convince them that their system is wrong and their gods false. They must once and for all abandon the idea of conquest. They must cease to sing or to think of "Deutschland über alles." They must discover in the midst of military disaster and bankruptcy that their only hope of the future is to live as other nations live.

When that time comes the German people will be willing to give a guaranty of peace. They will be willing to accept the democratic theory of self-government. They will be willing to agree to the independence of small nations. They will be willing to accept justice in place of force as the international standard, but they will not be ready to do these things and repudiate military autocracy until they have tasted defeat.

And so, Mr. President, I am reconciled to the idea of extending the age limits of the draft, because nothing but a great military triumph can bring a real and a permanent peace.

President Wilson expressed the thought in terse and striking phrase at Baltimore, when he declared the purpose of the American people. He said:

Force, force to the utmost, force without stint or limit, the righteous and triumphant force which shall make right the law of the world and cast every selfish dominion down in the dust.

Under the present age limits we have raised over 3,000,000 men, without materially encroaching upon those in deferred classifications. Under the proposed extension provided in this bill we can increase our forces to more than 5,000,000 without calling married men who are supporting families and without taking men or boys who are needed in essential industries.

With such a force the road to victory and to peace may be comparatively short. The harder we hit the shorter the fight and the lower the cost and loss.

As to the terms of that peace, I do not think the time has arrived to discuss them. For the present I prefer simply to stand with the President in earnest advocacy of—

Force, force to the utmost, force without stint or limit—

and to let a discussion of the terms of peace wait till that force has brought the German mind to a condition in which it can see things as the rest of the world sees things.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, when the Senate bill was before the Senate and before the House bill was substituted for it, one or two little amendments were adopted, and I am now going to ask that they be submitted to the Senate. They had already been adopted by the Senate when the Senate bill was under consideration, but were not put in the House bill as reported.

Mr. THOMAS. Will the Senator from Maryland yield to me for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon has the floor. Does he yield?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I will not interrupt until the amendments to which the Senator from Oregon refers shall have been disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon proposes an amendment which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 12, line 14, after the word "person," it is proposed to strike out the words "under the age of 21" and to insert a comma, and in line 16, after the word "Navy" to add "while under the age of 21."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That amendment was adopted by the Senate to the original Senate bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 18, after the word "person," it is proposed to insert "not connected with the Military Establishment."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, there is one matter to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate, for fear I might have unintentionally and inadvertently misled the Senate in my statement as to what is contained in the bill now pending before the Senate. Section 2, of the House bill, the section being found on page 2 of the bill now before the Senate, H. R. 12731, was omitted from the bill as reported to the Senate. That section provided:

SEC. 2. That no alien who is a citizen or subject of any of the countries cobelligerent with the United States in the present war shall, unless contrary to existing treaties, be granted exemption from military service or placed in deferred classification under the provisions of this act or under any rule or regulation to be issued by authority granted under the provisions of this act solely on account of alienage: And provided further, That the War Department shall immediately after the passage of this act reclassify all aliens heretofore registered who are citizens or subjects of any of the countries cobelligerent with the United States in the present war and who have been exempted or placed in deferred classification on account of alienage, and said aliens shall be immediately called for service unless such action would be contrary to existing treaties: Provided, That the act of May 18, 1917, is hereby amended accordingly.

Mr. President, it was thought inadvisable, after having heard from the War Department and the State Department, to put that section in the bill, and it was omitted entirely from the bill as reported. The reasons given for omitting it are thus stated by the War Department:

The new section 2 of the House bill, as passed, should be omitted. It forbids exemption of an alien cobelligerent except where a treaty would be broken thereby. This affects principally British, Italian, and Russian subjects. The provision is unwise and needless; unwise because it would offend our allies to go about the matter otherwise than by negotiations and needless because the same object is already attained by negotiation and treaties with the British Government, and is capable of speedy attainment by negotiation with the Italian Government; and its application to Russian aliens would, in the present state of affairs with Russia, be a most dangerous element, imperiling the present delicate situation.

There are already negotiations pending with Italy and possibly with Japan and some of the other of our allies to adjust these differences by treaties. I call attention to that because I did not call attention to it particularly when the House bill was substituted for the Senate bill.

There is one other matter to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate, lest it be said hereafter that I did not direct attention to it when the House bill was substituted for the Senate bill. Section 5 of the bill now before the Senate provides:

That all men rendered available for induction into the military service of the United States through registration or draft heretofore or hereafter made pursuant to law, shall be liable to service in the Army or the Navy or the Marine Corps, and shall be allotted to the Army, the Navy, and the Marine Corps under regulations to be prescribed by the President: Provided, That all persons drafted and allotted to the Navy or the Marine Corps in pursuance hereof shall, from the date of allotment, be subject to the laws and regulations governing the Navy and the Marine Corps, respectively.

That was a new section not included in the House bill and not included in the Senate bill when it was pending. I therefore thought I would call the attention of the Senate to it.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. THOMAS. I desire to know the status of the so-called Thomas amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no such thing as the Thomas amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. I said "so called."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is trying to answer the Senator. What is called the Thomas amendment is embodied in the bill as reported by the committee as a substitute for the House bill.

Mr. THOMAS. Then no separate vote is required upon that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. None at all; it is a part of the substitute bill.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I was under the impression that we were amending the so-called Thomas amendment. I wish to offer to this portion of the bill an amendment which is quite important, it seems to me. Read in connection with the context it merely authorizes the President to make regulations under which all of those who are engaged in industries which shall be designated as essential may, under suitable regulations, be enrolled as though they were in the service of the United States, and may wear the insignia of such service. I offer that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland.

The SECRETARY. Following the amendment last agreed to it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, That while any such person is so engaged in any employment or occupation, including agriculture, designated necessary or essential for the operation of the military forces or for the maintenance of the national interest, such person may be enrolled as though in the service of the United States and shall be entitled to wear some suitable badge, insignia, or uniform of such service.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, do I understand that an amendment to any portion of the bill is now in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland is in order.

Mr. FRANCE. I desire to offer another amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What becomes of the amendment the Senator has already offered. Does the Senator desire to withdraw it?

Mr. FRANCE. No; I understood that it had been adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No. The question is on the amendment just offered by the Senator from Maryland.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FALL and Mr. KIRBY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico is recognized.

Mr. FRANCE. Have I the floor?

Mr. FALL. I simply wanted to say that I have an amendment referring to section 2, which has just been under discussion, and before going to any other portion of the bill I should like to have an opportunity to offer it.

Mr. FRANCE. I will yield to the Senator from New Mexico for that purpose.

Mr. FALL. I understood that the Chair had recognized me.

Mr. FRANCE. If I have the floor I will yield to the Senator from New Mexico to perfect the portion of the bill which has just been under discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico is recognized.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, on yesterday I offered a proposed amendment in order that it might be printed. There seemed to be a little parliamentary tangle in reference to it. I offered it under the supposition that it might be proper as a substitute for section 2. There seemed to be confusion in the minds of all of us as to whether it should be offered in that way or upon motion to strike out section 2 as amended and insert.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will hold that motion in order.

Mr. FALL. Then, I move, Mr. President, to strike out section 2 as amended and insert the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of section 2 as amended it is proposed to insert the following:

That every man registered under the provisions of the draft act of May 18, 1917, or under acts amendatory thereof, and to be registered hereafter under the terms thereof and of this act, and every able-bodied man from 45 to 60 years of age, is hereby declared to be in the military service of the United States, except where heretofore or hereafter discharged from such service for physical disability or mental incompetence.

The President is hereby authorized to classify all such registered men for combat and for other service, giving permits in his discretion to those engaged in industrial and other occupations to continue therein, or from time to time to change same, always being subject, however, to call for actual military service during the period of this war.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, the amendment just proposed does not seek to interfere with the classification which has already been made of those subject to the draft, or in any other way to interfere with any action which may have been taken by the administrative department directly or through any subordinate or by any order approved by the President. The President, under the amendment, is simply given the authority to control the able-bodied men in the United States of America. There are no exceptions provided, and if the amendment is adopted there will be none. The bank president will be in the military service of the United States as well as the janitor of the bank. The lawyer, the minister, the doctor, and every other man above 18 and under 60 will be in the military service of the United States, and can be allowed to continue in his present occupation or to change it with the permission of the President, and not to change it unless he has such permission. It makes no distinctions and no exemptions. It would cover Members of Congress, members of State legislatures, officials of the United States Government, and officials of State governments, judges, and all. It would do entirely away with all exemptions of any kind or character, except in the case of a discharge for physical disability or mental incompetency. It places the entire man power of the country in the hands absolutely of the President of the United States.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator, does that involve all vocations? Does it give the President power to direct whether or not they shall continue their vocations?

Mr. FALL. That is my purpose. I think it would have that effect.

Mr. VARDAMAN. It gives him absolute and unlimited power over the persons between the ages named?

Mr. FALL. I think so; it is my purpose to give the President of the United States that power.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Does the Senator know of an instance where that power has ever been exercised by any potentate in the history of the world?

Mr. FALL. Yes. If time allowed, I could cite a great many instances in which it has been exercised, but not in which the authority has been invested by a parliamentary body.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. FALL. The Senator, of course, understands that my time is very limited.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not want to take the Senator's time.

Mr. FALL. I am not intending to indicate that I will not be glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. PENROSE. I only wish to know whether the effect of the amendment would be to give the President of the United States power to tell a Senator or a Representative that he must abandon his office to which the people have elected him and pursue some other occupation?

Mr. FALL. Of course, Mr. President, a question of that character might be answered in such a way as to lead to the ridiculous, if we assume that the President of the United States would say to a Senator, "I will place you in the military service"; but if that is the purport of the Senator's question, I say "yes"; that is what I mean; and under the amendment the President of the United States can take me from the Senate Chamber and put me into the military service to-morrow.

Mr. PENROSE. That is highly improper, it seems to me.

Mr. FALL. Well, I do not agree with the Senator.

Mr. PENROSE. I know the Senator does not.

Mr. FALL. I think if, in the opinion of the Commander in Chief, I can better serve the country in the trenches than in the Senate, it is my duty to go where he commands me.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, this is a very important amendment, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The SECRETARY called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gerry	Martin	Smith, Ariz.
Baird	Gore	Nelson	Smith, Mich.
Bankhead	Guion	New	Smoot
Beckham	Hale	Norris	Sterling
Borah	Henderson	Nugent	Sutherland
Brandegee	Johnson, Cal.	Overman	Thomas
Calder	Johnson, S. Dak.	Owen	Townsend
Chamberlain	Jones, N. Mex.	Penrose	Trammell
Colt	Jones, Wash.	Phelan	Underwood
Culberson	Kellogg	Pittman	Vardaman
Cummins	Kendrick	Poindexter	Wadsworth
Curtis	Kenyon	Ransdell	Walsh
Dillingham	Kirby	Reed	Warren
Fall	Lenroot	Robinson	Watson
Fernald	Lodge	Saulsbury	Weeks
Fletcher	McCumber	Shafroth	Wilfley
France	McKellar	Sheppard	Wolcott
Frelinghuysen	McNary	Shields

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think more than a year ago I introduced an amendment of practically the same character as that which has just been introduced by the Senator from New Mexico, except that the bill which I introduced provided for service between the ages of 18 and 62 years. No action, of course, has been taken upon that bill. Another difference between the pending amendment and the bill which I introduced at that time, and which has been before the Committee on Military Affairs all this time, is that in that bill I made the exception that was then made in the draft law, and that exception applied to Federal and State officers.

I am in hearty accord with the sentiments expressed by the Senator from New Mexico and believe this ought to be the law. I believe that we ought to—if we want to use the word "conscript"—conscript all of the manhood and the womanhood, too, of the United States to end this war in the quickest possible time. I do not believe that under our Constitution, however, even as a war measure, the President could be given the power to deprive a State of its representation in Congress, either in the Senate or in the House. But whether he could or not, under such an amendment I am certain that he would never attempt to do anything of the kind.

Mr. President, when we had before us yesterday the amendment providing for educational facilities for our soldiers, I thought it best not to delay a vote, although I desired to express myself and explain my reasons for voting against it at that time, and I can not allow the matter to pass without stating that I voted against the educational provision, not because I had any objection to its merits, but because I considered that it was premature. Those who enlist will remain there undoubtedly until the close of the war, and at the close of the war we can determine who will be affected, and we can determine the cost. It has been estimated that the cost might amount to two or three billion dollars a year. That depends upon how long the war is going to last and how many people will enlist between the ages of 18 and 21. My own candid judgment is that it will cost us four billions a year, if it is construed to mean that the Government is to take the position of the father of the boy and send him to college and pay his expenses and his board and his tuition and his clothing. If that should be the case, I think it would not amount to much less than $4,000,000,000 a year at the close of this war. But in addition to that my own estimate is that if this war lasts two years longer we will be paying interest on bonds that will amount to about $4,000,000,000 more, and there is a question as to how much the Government can tax its people in time of peace for all of these extra services. Therefore I thought it best at least that that matter be deferred until after the war is over, until these soldiers return, and we can then determine the condition of our Treasury, the condition of the United States, and determine just what is intended. I do not know now whether it is intended that we shall make ministers out of all of our colored soldiers or whether we shall make doctors or lawyers out of them, under the provisions of this amendment, or whether they are to be educated in the many vocations, and what is true of the colored people is also true of all the white people. We ought to have something more definite than a mere statement that the Government shall educate all of the boys under 21 years of age after the war is over.

That, Mr. President, is the reason why I voted against it, not but that I believed that we rather owe a duty to those boys whom we take out of school to serve their country to assist them in that which they are deprived of by reason of that service, and I shall certainly be heartily in favor of anything of that character when the proper time comes to act on it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate for a moment to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico.

The amendment reads:

That every man registered under the provisions of the draft act of May 18, 1917, or under acts amendatory thereof, and to be registered hereafter under the terms thereof and of this act, and every able-bodied man from 45 to 60 years of age, is hereby declared to be in the military service of the United States, except where heretofore or hereafter discharged from such service for physical disability or mental incompetence.

That takes them all. There are several members of the Supreme Court of the United States who will be drafted under this amendment if it is adopted, innumerable Members of Congress, Members of the Senate, and countless members of the State governments. Surely Senators can not seriously vote for an amendment of this kind. I do not think it is necessary to argue the question. A mere statement of what it does would seem to preclude any Senator from seriously considering it. Are we going to break up our Government? Are we going to do away with Congress or with the United States Supreme Court? Are we going to do away with the State governments in the various States of our country? I am sure Senators do not want to do that; and yet that is what will be done when Senators vote for the substitution of this amendment.

I am not going to argue it further, for it seems to me that all that is necessary to be done is to call the attention of Senators to the meaning of this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. FALL. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). Making the same transfer that I made on the previous roll call, I vote "nay."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). As I announced awhile ago, I am paired for the day with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. Were I at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I announce my general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and vote "nay."

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] to the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I inquire if the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I withhold my vote, having a general pair with that Senator. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PENROSE (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], which, by arrangement with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], I transfer to the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], and will let my vote stand. I desire that this announcement shall stand for all succeeding votes during the day.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] which I transfer to the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], and vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (after having voted in the negative). I observe that the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has not voted. I have a pair with that Senator, and therefore withdraw my vote.

So Mr. FALL's amendment to the amendment of the committee was rejected.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, on page 8, in line 5, after the word "emergency," I move to strike out that line and lines 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, and 13, and the two amendments that have been since added to that particular proviso.

Just for a moment I am going to add to what I said on yesterday by calling the attention of the Senate to the provision of the present law, which I think is ample and full and complete. The draft law now provides as follows:

No exemption or exclusion shall continue when a cause therefor no longer exists.

Under that provision of law the President, through the War Department, has adopted rules and regulations by which that is being carried out, and can be further carried out. I do not think at this time that there are any reasons why we should take this matter out of the hands of the President of the United States. He is not asking that it be taken out of his hands. There are no facts, as it seems to me, which have occurred in our country that require it to be taken out of his hands and more particular directions given him as to what to do. The War Department is handling the labor matter with a great deal of skill and ability, and the President is managing the whole industrial situation with a great deal of skill and ability. We are having less trouble with strikes than was ever known in our history before, either in war times or in peace times; and I do not think we ought in this way to legislate against one class of our people without taking in the employing class also.

There is another argument against this amendment, which reason is perfectly practical. The House, which is a part of Congress, has, by overwhelming vote—about 2 to 1—voted to strike this proposition out. If it is voted in by us, it will go to conference. It seems to me that it will be a needless formality. That it will be stricken out in conference is a practical certainty. Then, why should we undertake to force it upon the House and to force it upon the country against the country's will? It seems to me there is no demand for it. It seems to me that we are doing a futile thing. It seems to me that we are stirring up trouble for ourselves when there is no trouble, other than some trifling trouble here and there, which would come whether we adopted this provision or not.

Under those circumstances—there being no demand for the legislation, there being no reason for it, there being no necessity for it—it seems to me we ought to vote to strike out this useless provision in the bill. It is already strong enough as it is in the present act. The whole subject is in the hands of the President of the United States, who is managing it well, who has done it successfully, who has probably handled the labor situation more successfully than anyone who has ever undertaken to handle it heretofore; and we ought not to interfere with him or hamper him or harass him or the country about it. I think what we ought to do is to stand by him in this matter, and leave the question entirely in his hands under the law as it now exists.

Mr. President, on the amendment to strike out I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I am satisfied that if the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] had made his very patriotic speech before the last vote was taken, that vote would have been different, and his own vote would have been cast differ-ently. The proposition which I submitted to the Senate was to do exactly what he says he wants to do by striking out this provision—leave it entirely in the hands of the President of the United States as to what he should do.

The Senator insists that there should be no distinction made in legislation in the treatment of the employer and the employee; and yet that distinction and that difference in the treatment is now engraved in law. I proposed to do away with it, and the Senator voted against it.

Mr. President, the entire section 2 as it is drawn, as I have said on one or two different occasions, applies to only one of the three classifications. It applies to none of the others. The proposition as it is involved now, it seems, is opposed by some of the colleagues of the Senator upon the ground that the President already has the power to do it, and that this is an interference with him; and it is opposed by others upon the ground that this is giving to the President a direction to do something that we should not interfere with the President in doing, but should leave it in his hands to do or not, as he pleases. All of these different propositions were involved in the substitute for the entire section, including this portion of it which the Senator now is objecting to, and which he has just assisted in voting down.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask you for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement of my pair and its transfer as on the previous vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). As I announced awhile ago, I am paired for to-day with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. I do not know how he would vote on this amendment and I withhold my vote.

Mr. SHERMAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] and withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote I would vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote I would vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I am informed that my pair if present would vote on this proposition the same way I would, and I will therefore vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the last vote of the transfer of my pair, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WALSH. My colleague [Mr. MYERS] is unavoidably absent and is paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN]. If present my colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. GERRY. I wish to announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is detained by illness in his family.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS]; and The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS].

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am informed that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] if present would vote as I would vote, and I am therefore going to take the liberty of voting. I vote "nay."

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the negative). I observe that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], with whom I have a general pair, has not voted, but I have permission to vote, and I will allow my vote to stand as given.

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 40, as follows:

So Mr. McKELLAR's amendment was rejected.

Mr. KIRBY. I desire to call up the amendment which has already been sent to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Amend by striking out "eighteen," in line 3, page 7, and in line 1, page 9, and inserting in lieu the word "twenty." On page 10, line 17, strike out the word "eighteenth" and insert "twentieth," and on page 11, line 1, strike out the word "eighteen" and insert "twenty."

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, this is the same amendment that was proposed to the Senate bill when it was pending on this question and is now renewed and presented for consideration and adoption in the passage of the present bill.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that this matter is so plain and so clearly unnecessary in one aspect of the case and so absolutely unjust, so far as reducing the age to 18 years is concerned, that it ought not to be seriously considered. It appears that there is but one reason on earth, if you have in mind the conservation of the man power of these United States, that would compel the Senate to go to the low age of 18 years in the draft.

What is the condition? The adoption of the proposals in this bill will divide the man power of the United States, so far as the registration and draft is concerned, into three classes. There is first the third class, of 31 years to 45 years of age, as proposed in the bill, and that includes over 13,000,000 men. There are of the middle class, between 21 and 31 years of age, nine and a half million men. There are in the other class, of boys between 18 and 21 years of age, 3,000,000, as the census will show and as the estimates are made.

Then when the man power of the Nation is authorized and required to stand up to bear the military burdens of the Nation you have thirteen and one-half million men standing along the line there from 45 to 31, you have nine and a half million men between 21 and 31 standing there, and you have 3,000,000 boys 18 to 21 years old standing here; and what is proposed to be done?

It is proposed by the terms of the bill here to say to the men on yonder front—13,000,000 men—1 man in every 13 stand forth for military duty, and in the classification here of nine million and a half you say to these men less than 1 man out of every 8 will move forward to take up the military burdens of the country. When you come to this third class—the 3,000,000 boys under 21 years of age—what do you say? Do you say, "Oh, Mr. Inspector of the Draft, be careful; tread lightly here; these are the darlings of the homes of America"? These boys have not yet been allowed to vote. Two-thirds of them have not finished their high-school education, and three-fourths of them have not finished their college education, such of them as are able to take it. Do you say, "Oh, Mr. Inspector of the Draft, tread softly here"? You must remember that already 1,000,000 boys out of this class of 3,000,000 have stepped forward and volunteered and gone into the United States Army and are now on the fighting front, be it said to the everlasting credit of the chivalrous patriotism of the American boy.

That is the condition that you find here to-day; and what do you propose to do? To take less than 1 in 13 out of the 13,000,000 men and less than 1 in 9 of the second class—21 to 31—but you propose to take 2,000,000 out of the 3,000,000 boys from 18 to 21 years of age. Where is the justice in that sort of a proposition? That is the condition that is proposed and brought to your attention here to-day; and it is demanded that you do this for what?

Let us see something of the dire necessity which compels the doing of such a thing, a thing so singularly unequal and unfair as to be shocking to the sense of justice.

It is said that we must have 5,000,000 men in the Army; that we have agreed with our allies to put 80 divisions in France, and we have agreed to maintain a reservoir of 18 divisions here in the United States, which will be slightly under 5,000,000 men.

What is the condition so far as the man power is concerned? Already in sight there are 1,500,000 men in France. There are 1,500,000 men in camp in the United States in uniforms now. Three million men have already been raised. There are 580,000 men in class 1 who have not yet been called in the old draft. There are over 600,000 men eligible for service under the new registration above 21 years old. That is 1,100,000 men. There are 100,000 men, or, say, 90,000, every month coming of age. There is that much more, and it is proposed to take 601,000 men out of the classification above 31 years of age. That will furnish you more than 5,000,000 men—yes, a million more than the 5,000,000 they say it is necessary to raise.

Then, why should you take these boys and send them yonder to the battle line? That seems to be the condition that is here. If you wipe out all the figures there, if you take out this estimate and that estimate and the other and get down to a plain, practical, common-sense proposition, France has borne the brunt of the war for four years, a war raging on her own territory and at her own front door. France has only called her 18-year-old boys this summer, after four years of fighting. That was what France regarded as the necessity for going down and taking the boys out of school—that man power, if you will call that man power. That was their idea of what necessity required, and what is ours? That of the 31 to 45 class less than 601,000 shall be taken out of 13,000,000, men who are hale and strong and vigorous and have made their fortunes, and who are subject to military duty and capable of performing it. You take less than a million men out of 13,000,000 in this classification, about a million out of the 21 to 31, but you put 2,700,000 boys from 18 to 21 years of age in the Army.

That is what is proposed to be done here, and why? Is there any fairness in that sort of a proposition? It seems to me that there is none, and that there can not be any argued into it. What is put in this bill here in order to make it look a little more smooth and be a little more palatable? They said it is true we are going to take the boys out of school and out of the colleges, but if they come back alive and are able after this war is over, we are going to allow them to go to school for a year, or it may be two years, and some of the Senators are objecting to that. Why? Because they say it will cost these other men who have not gone to war more than they ought to be required to pay for the benefit of the education of the men who have stood up at the call of the country and fought its battles. That is the condition that has been shown here on the floor to-day. That is the condition which confronts us now.

Now, what is the necessity for it? The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] has offered an amendment here to take in men from 45 to 60 years of age. Why should they be put into the classification when all the 13,000,000 men now between 31 and 45 years of age are excused except 601,000?

If our Army of 5,000,000 men is supposed to be strong enough to take care of the condition—and I believe it will be; the Chief of Staff says it is and will be—if we can raise the Army to 5,000,000 men without taking these boys under 21 years of age, then there are 600,000 boys between 20 and 21 years of age who can be better spared from that class than the others.

Add the 600,000 more, and you have 5,600,000 men, and Senators I think that a reasonable estimate, and nobody needs to increase it beyond that. I think we will not expect to lose more than 100,000 men killed and disabled a month during the progress of this war, and there come of age every month 100,000 men in these United States who will keep the Army up to fighting strength and excuse about seven and a half million men in deferred classifications, in the present draft, and 13,000,000 men in the draft above 31 years of age. It will exclude them absolutely from military service.

That is the condition, it seems to me, absolutely and clearly. It is before us to-day. That is what we expect to do. Why? Because we need an army. It is not said that we need any particular kind of an army but only men who make good soldiers, and no man, military or civilian, but will write himself down as incompetent to decide the matter who would tell you that a man from 21 to 31 years of age is not in his full physical power.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. KIRBY. I regret exceedingly that I have no opportunity to finish.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, in explanation of the vote I am about to cast I desire to make a few remarks and only a few.

I am opposed to compelling our boys of 18 years of age to be taken to France to fight overseas unless it is absolutely necessary. I would have these boys called and trained and put in a deferred class to be a great reserve army to be held and called only when absolutely necessary to win the war. I believe from the figures reported by the War Department we will be able to get the 4,000,000 men without calling these boys. I prepared an amendment that I propose to offer in the following language:

That all persons 18 years of age who may be drafted under the provisions of this act shall be placed in a deferred classification and be trained for military service at such time and under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe and held in reserve, subject only to be called to the colors overseas whenever the President in his judgment shall deem it necessary for the winning of the war.

Mr. President, last Saturday night I bought the New York Evening Post after I had prepared this amendment, and strange to say the amendment that I had prepared was almost the language of the French amendment that was passed two weeks ago. I ask the Secretary to read one paragraph only from the New York Evening Post as to the action of France on this subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

France, too, is concerned at the present moment with its boys of 18. On August 1 the chamber voted for the registration of the class of 1920. The formal vote for the call to the colors is still to come, but the Government has announced its intention of bringing the recruits into training in October or November. "By the end of the spring of 1919," said the undersecretary for war, "we want to have all our cards in our hands," with a view to a swift and decisive victory. That the same sentiment which has manifested itself at Washington had to be taken into account in the Chamber of Deputies appears from a communication from Gen. Foch read in Parliament. "It goes without saying," wrote the commander in chief, "that the class of 1920 is to be called only when the circumstances demand it, and that under all circumstances it will be kept for instruction in the depots until after winter. Even after the completion of training the young soldiers will not be sent to the front except in case of absolute necessity." At the same time that the registration of the boys of 18 was asked for the Government proposed to release entirely or conditionally the classes from 1888 to 1891, that is to say the men of 50 down to 47. In other words, at a time when France still finds it impossible to spare men of 46, it nevertheless recognizes that the employment of boys of 18 is an enterprise justifiable only by imperative demands.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, France has 37,000,000 people and without taking her 18-year-old boys they raised 7,000,000 men. The United States with her 110,000,000, and with figures I contend shown by the War Department, we can raise 5,000,000 men, and we need to raise only 4,000,000 it is said; without taking these young men we can raise the 4,000,000 which is needed in France.

With these facts in my mind, with this editorial and this amendment proposed, I went to the Secretary of War to discuss with him my amendment. He assured me that he did not intend to call the boys of 18 years of age until an emergency should arise. I asked him if I could make that statement upon the floor of the Senate. He said yes.

Therefore, Mr. President, relying upon his statement, relying upon the facts that appear before me, I am going to vote for this bill. I am not going to offer this amendment, trusting and believing that these boys will be trained as they ought to be trained—trained, Mr. President, without discrimination. I have heard it said that they were going to take the college boys and those in the high schools and exempt them. Mr. President, that is not fair. We ought to have them all in the same class and treat them all alike, the boy on the farm, the boy at the workbench, the laborer's son, and the college boy together. If one is to be exempted, exempt them all. If you take one, take them all. If they are needed take them and let us win this war. As I said, the Secretary of War assures me that he is not going to take them except the emergency arises when we need them to win this war, and with that statement, desiring to carry out the program of the War Department, I shall vote for the bill without amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am very glad to hear the statement that has just been made by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], but if I understand the history of this bill, it is presented here in the thought that it is necessary to have the 18-year-old boys drafted at this time for the purpose of winning the war. The statement of the Secretary of War is to the effect that he will not draft these 18-year-old boys or require them to go to war until after the other classes are exhausted.

Mr. OVERMAN. I did not say that. I said he would not call them overseas until the emergency should arise.

Mr. POMERENE. Very well; I want to be entirely accurate in the matter. These boys, then, will not be required to go across the sea until among the last. If that is the policy, and knowing the Secretary of War as I do, I believe that statement; but if that is the policy of the Department of War, then pray tell me what is the objection to having a provision of that kind in the bill itself?

Mr. President, I yield to no man in my desire to win this war. If the department had come here to the Senate and said that it was necessary to have 5,000,000 men or 7,000,000 or 8,000,000 men in the Army, I would have accepted that statement without any qualification whatever and acted accordingly. If it had been necessary to raise an army of that proportion now, then it might have been necessary to take the 18-year-old boys. But I can not find it in my heart to draft the 18-year-old boys when

I receive information every day to the effect that in nearly all the substantial communities of Ohio and elsewhere throughout the country there are many married men with wives who are not dependent upon them for support, who have their own means of acquiring a livelihood, or who perhaps before their marriage were dependent upon their own efforts or were supported by their parents. I can not under these circumstances say to those men, "You need not go to service; we will let the 18-year-old boys fight not only their battles but your battles as well."

Mr. VARDAMAN. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to a statement made by the Chief of Staff, Gen. March. He said:

All of the men obtained under the proposed change in the draft law—approximately 2,300,000—we expect to have in France by June 30, 1919.

I submit that there is nothing in the suggestion made by the Senator from North Carolina that these boys are not going to be used.

Mr. POMERENE. I am obliged to the Senator from Mississippi for that contribution to the debate. When it comes to the qualification of these boys for service I beg to refer Senators to the debate which occurred in the House just two or three days ago, in which Gen. March, the Chief of Staff, was quoted as having said before the Military Affairs Committee of the House that the 20-year-old men made better soldiers than the 21-year-old men.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The only thing in this bill that would authorize the dividing of these young men into classes and retaining the 18-year-old class until the last is to be found on page 7, line 6, which reads as follows:

Provided, That the President may draft such persons liable to military service in such sequence of ages and at such time or times as he may prescribe.

I have no question about the statement of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]; I have no question but that he received that information from the Secretary of War; but I say to the Senator that I am not going to be a party to the deception of the American people in any way, shape, or form. If this bill passes as it is, we might as well understand now as in the future that these young men will be needed in France before this war is over, and possibly by next June.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, when they are needed, I shall vote to send them, but not before.

Now, I want to call the Senator's attention to the very phraseology which was read by the Senator from Oregon. Under that phraseology the War Department could, if it would, send over the 18-year-old boy before it sent the 19-year-old boy or the 20-year-old boy or the 25-year-old man or the 30-year-old man.

Mr. President, of course, if the Senate, in its wisdom, shall vote down this amendment, I hope that another amendment will be offered limiting the age to 19. If those amendments are defeated, of course I shall surrender my judgment to the superior wisdom of the Senate and vote for the bill, but never will that vote have the consent of my judgment.

Mr. TOWNSEND and Mr. POINDEXTER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Will the Senator from Michigan allow me to offer an amendment to the pending amendment, so that they may be discussed together?

Mr. TOWNSEND. If it will not be taken out of my time, I will yield to the Senator in order that he may introduce his amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan has the floor.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I regret exceedingly that it is very difficult for a legislator to determine exactly what the needs of the Government are at this time. Only a few weeks ago we were told by the War Department that it was not necessary or advisable to change the age limit. Has anything happened in the meanwhile to change the situation? Nothing has been shown. We then believed that the Secretary of War was right, and I still believe he was so far as a change in the minimum age is concerned. I believe, as the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] has stated, that the people ought to be told the truth. I know that there is altogether too much deception and misrepresentation in this most serious matter. What are the facts the Senate ought to know before it takes this proposed step?

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] has suggested that probably the casualties to our Army will not exceed 100,000. The best informed men who are in Europe and who have considered this matter understand that the casualty list of the American Army will number at least a million men if the war continues another year.

Mr. President, we are forming an army. We are governed by two desires in this—one is to create the most efficient army possible, and the other is to disturb home industries no more than is necessary. When the original draft bill was up for consideration, the limits proposed were 19 and 25 years of age. I opposed both limits at that time, believing that 21 should be the minimum and 45 the maximum. A compromise was finally secured which agreed upon 21 and 31 years. I then stated reasons which were sufficient, for me at least, why boys under 21 should not be drafted. I realize that of our Army now, the larger part of it, is composed of boys below their majority; boys who have voluntarily enlisted with the consent of their parents. We now have left in the country millions more of boys who have not yet enlisted, a great many of them not fit for military service because of immaturity.

But the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] says that the Secretary of War tells him that these boys are not to be called. In saying this the Secretary admits that they ought not to be drafted. Mr. President, let the people of the United States understand that this age limit has been contended for by the Army from the beginning. The boys who are used to obeying their parents and teachers, who have not yet acquired the habit of independence, will make good soldiers of course; they will go wherever they are sent. They have not yet learned the meaning of discretion, but those boys are the hope of their country's future.

What is the use of fighting, of making all this sacrifice, if we are to have nothing left when it is over? Oh, but it is said we need them to make our Army, for there are a great many within the present draft age who have been exempted for one reason or another. Let me call your attention to two cases. There is in the State of Michigan a young man whose father is worth millions who has been exempted. His exemption was against the decision of the exemption board, who knew his circumstances well, but by appeal to the President he has been relieved of the obligation of serving in the Army. He insisted that he was necessary to industry. The board did not believe it; nobody else believed it; but he was exempted; he does not have to go. There are hundreds of thousands of similar cases no doubt.

I received a letter yesterday from a woman saying, "I have four boys already in the Army. For God's sake spare my baby"—her last son, hardly out of knee trousers, almost in the nursery, still in the school. You propose to take him and exempt the other. Is that just? Is it in keeping with the spirit of democracy?

I say to you, Mr. President, it should be the duty of the War Department to go over the exemption list that has been created heretofore and to select the men who can go, who can be better spared in the future than these boys can now be.

To take these boys is a great mistake. For four years of desperate war three nations, whose combined population is scarcely equal to that of the United States, have held the German forces without calling upon their boys of 18, but now you propose at the beginning to compel our boys to fight this war for you. Those whose fortunes and futures are established are to be exempt and innocent youth is to make the country safe through its sacrifice. England and France have fought their great battles with men and not with irresponsible, unthinking boys. I would like to have the boys left at home and in school until they are needed. If the country requires them, I shall vote to take them; but it has been proved here over and over again that they are not needed, although they are demanded. There are plenty of men who will be left within the draft age who can be better spared than can these boys. I repeat, it is the object of this legislation to take these lads. There is no use trying to dodge the fact, for it is true, whatever the Secretary of War may state. The War Department is going to control this army; it is wrong to deceive the people by misrepresenting the facts to them.

I know we must have more men, of course. This bill comes, as many other bills have come, in such a way that if we can not amend it we have got to vote for it. I want to vote to perfect the bill, to strike out the minimum age limit and to leave it at 21 years. Failing in that, what is left me but to vote for this bill, for we must have more men? It is the argument of a miserable timeserver to say in this crucial hour, when the future must be considered quite as much as the present, that any man who opposes this limit is opposed to creating a sufficient Army and Navy. Every patriot is for an adequate Army. It should have been created long ago. Congress made ample provision for it. It has voted billions of dollars and will vote to conscript every man necessary, including youth and old age. The first question for us to decide is what is necessary now. The logic and proof is against this minimum limit. Let us say to the mothers of this country, "You may keep your children until ultimate necessity demands that they shall go to the front. You will then be willing to give them to your country." I feel very deeply about this, Mr. President, as I did when the original draft bill was under consideration.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] offers no adequate excuse for changing his former vote when he says that conditions have changed. Oh, no; conditions have not changed a particle, so far as the material for the Army is concerned. We have enough fit men for 5,000,000 soldiers and yet leave these young boys exempt for the present. We ought not to vote this day against our better judgment, but we should proceed conscientiously; I confess, as I said to begin with, that it is difficult sometimes to understand the situation. We can not learn it from those in charge of the War Department, for they seem to believe that deception of the people is an essential to the conduct of the war. The patriotic mothers of the country will not be deceived. They will know and understand that their undeveloped, dependent boys have been taken and men with political influence and those alleged to be necessary to industry, but who refuse to work if conditions do not suit them, are exempt.

Mr. President, I shall support this amendment because it more nearly approximates my idea of justice than does the bill itself. Therefore, I shall vote for it. I shall vote for any proposition which will increase the minimum age limit over that proposed by the committee. If all amendments fail, I shall still vote for the bill, because I realize that we must make provisions for a larger army. I regret that there is no alternative for me.

Mr. KIRBY. I should like to ask the Senator from Michigan a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Michigan has expired.

Mr. KIRBY. Then I want to correct a statement made by the Senator. I intended to say that I did not think that the casualty list could be more than a hundred thousand a month, and that that many men were coming of age monthly.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I understand the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] is the pending amendment. I offer the amendment that I send to the desk as a substitute for that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "prescribe," in line 8, on page 2, it is proposed to insert the following:

> Except that persons under the age of 20 years shall not be called into other than training service, and that periods of training for persons under such age shall be so prescribed as to least interfere with farm work or production on the part of those actually so engaged or with the attendance of duly registered and bona fide students at school or college.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Dakota yield just a moment?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not want to interfere with anything that the Senator desires to say, but I was wondering whether this is a proper time, whether it is now in order, to offer this amendment. Is it not an amendment in the third degree?

Mr. STERLING. I do not think it can be.

Mr. SMOOT. I make the suggestion in order to save time, I will say to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. The Senator from Arkansas moves an amendment to the bill—not to the amendment, as I understand, but to the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. There is only one amendment that we are considering; it is an amendment to the House bill. That is the unfortunate situation the bill is in, and the Senator from Arkansas now offers an amendment to that amendment. If the amendment to the amendment is offered I think it will be an amendment in the third degree. I simply make the suggestion now in order to save time.

Mr. STERLING. I think, perhaps, the Senator from Utah is right. I overlooked the fact that the bill as presented is really an amendment; but, Mr. President, I hope I may be allowed to proceed, because I want this proposition to come squarely before the Senate and desire to submit a few observations in regard to the principle of the amendment which I have sent to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's amendment would be in order if it applied to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas, but it does not seem to touch that amendment. That amendment is amendable so far as that is concerned.

Mr. STERLING. I offer it as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, and it seems to me it is a proper substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. But it does not go to the question of the draft age.

Mr. SMOOT. I may be mistaken, but it seems to me it is an amendment in the third degree.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, no time ought to be lost in this matter, because only three-quarters of an hour remain for discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota will proceed.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, if I may proceed, I shall do so as hurriedly as possible. I have already spoken at some length on my amendment, and I shall occupy the time of the Senate very briefly now.

The more I have thought of the proposition to draft young men of 18 or from 18 to 20 into active service the more am I convinced that under present conditions we make a mistake in taking such a step. Until recently men within these ages have been permitted to volunteer and many thousands of them have taken advantage of the opportunity. We have applauded their action and we have congratulated the mothers of such young men on having raised their boys to be soldiers, with the heroism and patriotism to dare and to do for their country, to make the supreme sacrifice, if necessary, in behalf of freedom.

But, Mr. President, while these eager and enthusiastic thousands have volunteered their services, there are other thousands between those ages who have not done so. They outnumber by far those who have. Will you reproach them for being slackers, or will you consider their environment, their occupations, the necessity of their home life, filial affection itself, their ambitions, any or all of these, and others I might mention, as good and sufficient reasons for their remaining at home to help on the farm, in the store, in the shop or office, or to attend school or college until at least in a time of greater need their services are required or until having reached their majority they are free?

Mr. President, if these considerations are worth while as excuses for the boys who have not yet volunteered, they are worth while now when it comes to considering who shall be made subject to the draft. There ought to be yet an opportunity for them to serve in important industries, to assist in the maintenance of their families, to help in supplying the greatest of industrial needs, that of farm labor, to obtain an education, if they are otherwise so situated as to be able to secure it, and the opportunity also for the proper mental and physical development of those of slower growth.

Yet, Mr. President, I would not diminish the number which the Chief of Staff expects would be raised under this bill by a single man. Let there be but a fair distribution of the burden among those who are under the same or even greater obligations to bear it, and there will be no difficulty in raising the 2,300,000 of additional forces for the western front by June 30, 1919.

Gen. March says this number will be raised if the draft-age limit shall be extended from 18 to 45 years, but his estimate is based on the theory that out of the more than 10,000,000 of males between the ages of 32 and 45 every one of the nearly 8,000,000 of married men within those ages shall have deferred classifications, and that no married man shall be subject to draft in the first instance. Thus it is that the principle of liability of all men between 18 and 45 to military service, a principle embodied in the law from the beginning of the Government down to the present time, is to be rendered absolutely nugatory so far as married men of whatever age between these limits are concerned.

It is not a question of dependency on the married man at all. Marriage itself under this bill and under the theory of the War Department is to be the badge of exemption from military service, and the boys—thousands of them mere boys—are left to bear the burden and fight all the battles for the maintenance of the free institutions which exist for the benefit of the married as well as for themselves. It is an exemption which loyal and patriotic married men will themselves not claim.

To my mind, Mr. President, there is gross injustice in the plan, and that this is the plan, I think I am warranted in saying from the evidence before the Senate. It has been stated here more than once that the idea is to take into service at once the boys between 18 and 20 years of age, and when Gen. in France by June 30, 1919," he means that it includes the March says, "We expect under this bill to have 2,300,000 men boys from 18 to 20. It is an injustice because it is a discrimination in favor of married men who, as well as the boys, owe a duty and an obligation in regard to military service; it is opposed to the spirit of our institutions.

Mr. President, the idea involved in my amendment does not exempt from draft; the boys are to be drafted for training service between the ages of 18 and 20, and as they become 20 they are liable to active service and are then prepared for it. Meanwhile they have been all the time in the service of their country, in the shop forging the instruments both of industry and of war, or on the farm engaged in the production of food for ourselves and our allies, or in the schools preparing for fields of higher usefulness, or in training for war; and meanwhile, too, without going to the extreme contemplated by the bill, we shall have raised for our armies all the men who can be used and all the Secretary of War, with his now enlarged vision, demands.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I wish to state in a few words my opposition to this particular amendment, although I am in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas. There can be only one reason in the world for drafting boys of 18 and 19, and that is imperative necessity. If the Congress determines that the necessity exists, I do not desire myself to put any embarrassment in the way of the executive department or the Commander in Chief as to how he shall use the force which we have determined it is necessary to give him. If we shall determine as a result of the vote to-day that the boys are to be drafted, it must be by reason of the fact that they are needed, because Gen. March and Gen. Crowder were very frank in saying that all these men would be in the service in Europe by the 30th of June next. So that it is not, in my judgment, in accordance with wisdom or the best service to be had to throw any embarrassment around the manner in which the executive department shall use the boys after we have determined that the boys are imperatively necessary.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, speaking upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas, when class 1 of the men within the present draft age shall have been exhausted, our Army will number 3,500,000 men, rather more than less. The Provost Marshal General has reported that there are effectives, even with his rigorous standards, within the ages of 31 and 45, inclusive, numbering 601,000 men. In my opinion, and using the same basis adopted by the Provost Marshal General, there will be, between the ages of 31 and 45, more than one million men capable of bearing arms who can be classified in the first order. The men of 20 will number more than 700,000. Adding these together, we have an addition to the Army, if the ages of 18 and 19 are excluded, of at least 1,700,000. I think there will be more rather than less, because in the reconsideration of the classification which must necessarily take place a great many men who have heretofore been deferred in classification will be advanced to the first rank. Adding the 1,700,000 men to the 3,500,000 who are now in the Army, or will be as soon as the present class 1 is exhausted, we will have an Army of 5,200,000 men. This Army will fully meet all the requirements the Chief of Staff has said it is now necessary to meet.

I am in favor of sending everybody to France if it becomes necessary, but I would send the boys of 18 the very last of all. Common humanity, common sense, I had almost said common decency, require us to hold these boys until the last. I would send next to the last the boys of 19. Whenever it shall appear by any sort of showing to be necessary to sacrifice these boys to the awful necessities of this conflict, I am ready to do that; but I am not ready to do it until it does become necessary. It is not necessary at this time. I intend to vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas, and I sincerely hope, if his amendment is not adopted, that he will then give us an opportunity to vote with respect to drafting boys of 18. All that I ask is that we send them last and not first.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I am not going to occupy the time of the Senate in discussing the merits of this measure now, but I wish to move to amend the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] by striking out "twenty," where it occurs, and inserting "twenty-one." I merely wish to make that motion in order to have the privilege of voting on it, and then, if that is not adopted, I shall vote for 20, and if that is not adopted, I shall vote for 19. If that is not adopted, I shall vote against the whole amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I am not going to make any speech. I just want to call attention to a little bit of the testimony.

The step that the Senate is about to take is a serious one. I know that the taking of young men from their homes and sending them to the battle front is one that touches the heart of every man, woman, and child in America; and nothing in the world except what seems to me to be a necessity would lead me to vote to do that. My principal object in rising now is that there may be no misunderstanding about the course that is suggested in this bill.

There has been more or less of misunderstanding about what the Secretary of War proposes to do. Under this bill the President has the power to divide these young men into classes, and in that way retain the 18-year-old men in this country a little while longer than he might retain the older ones; but that is the beginning and the end of his power, and there is no reason for any of us to misunderstand what the purpose of the War Department is. That is why I get up to say that I shall not be a party to misleading the American people with reference to these young men. Whatever may have been said on the side by the distinguished Secretary of War, whatever may have been said on the side and in some desultory conversation by the Chief of Staff, the record shows what they intended to do, and the record made by Mr. Baker before these committees shows what he intended to do, and that is what I intend to do when I vote to take these young men of 18. I vote to do it because I believe that in the emergency which confronts us, if we intend to win this war, we must get these young men over to the front, and get them there just as soon as they can possibly be sent there and sufficiently trained.

Now, let us see what the Secretary of War said. In his hearing before the House committee, he said:

> There are two reasons. In the first place, the men from 36 to 45 are all older men, and it would be unwise to have military units or contingents made up entirely of older men rather than a mixture of young and old. You want the superior youthfulness of some and the superior maturity of others to make a good composite, but the controlling reason is that the need for men will be such that the classes below 21 must be made immediately available in order to have enough men.

Is there any equivocation about that language?

Then he was asked this question by Mr. GARRETT:

> If you should call, according to the tables in the report of the Senate committee, men from the ages of 32 to 40, you would not get as many men between those ages as you will from 19 to 20 if you should take all.
> Secretary BAKER. That is perfectly true, and therefore if we are to get the men we need and as fast as we need them, we must have more men available than there are expected to be available in the ages above 31.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, on what page of the House hearings is that

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is on page 10, in Part II.

Now, Mr. President, what does Gen. March say? There is not any equivocation about that language of Mr. Baker, and the substance of it is contained in the Senate Military Affairs hearings. When they were discussing this question of the young men the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] asked Gen. March this question:

> And you do expect that that will take all of the men between 18 and 45, either in France or in the camps?
> Gen. MARCH. Before the year is out; I do.
> Senator REED. So that for all intents and purposes we might as well understand here that the 18-year-old has got to be ready to put on his uniform, not to-morrow or the next day, but within a very few months or weeks.
> Senator SMITH. Does it not amount to this——
> Senator REED. Just permit me to finish the sentence—and that you may delay him in camp and give him the benefit of the six months' training after you get it all organized, but that is where we come out; is not that so?
> Gen. MARCH. Yes; the fact of the matter is that the last man of the 2,300,000 men, in order to get him to France as a trained man by June 30, 1919, must inevitably be called out by at the least the first of next year, so that the most that anybody can gain will be the difference of age between when he becomes 18 years of age and next spring.

In other words, it is the purpose of the War Department to have these young men over there by June 30, 1919. Now, it is immaterial to me how Senators vote. I shall vote because I believe the necessities of this war require these young men there. That is the only thing that induces me to do it now, in addition to the fact that I believe the young men make the best soldiers after all. But I did not propose to sit here and have the American people deceived as to the purpose of this bill, which affects the whole life of the Republic and every home in the Republic. If it passes, every man within these draft ages—between 18 and 45—may be called by the 30th of June next, and only the President has power to detain them here for a short while if he wants to.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, I desire to ask if the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] made a motion, or just gave notice that he was going to make a motion, to amend the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Does the Senator direct his remarks to me?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I have made the motion. I have moved to amend by striking out "twenty," where it appears in the amendment, and inserting "twenty-one." That leaves it where it was.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Then the motion which I was about to make would not be in order. I was going to move to amend the motion made by the Senator from Arkansas by striking out the words "twentieth" and "twenty," where they occur, and inserting in lieu thereof "nineteenth" and "nineteen." The manifest purpose of that motion would be to make the draft ages within the limits of 19 and 45.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I will say to the Senator, if he will pardon the interruption, that the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] has an amendment making it 19. I think all of those ages are covered.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, I shall support the proposition that the limits shall be 19 to 45. I desire to state that I have a very sincere purpose to vote for a bill that will yield to the War Department every man that it asks for. I would not consent to any limits that would rob the War Department of even so small a number as 100,000 men. I want to see the Army increased to the full strength that the experts say it should be, and when they speak I accept their judgment as final, because upon the proposition of how many men we should have in the Army I confess that I am not qualified to speak. They tell us that we need 4,800,000 men. I have very carefully read the testimony given before the Senate Military Affairs Committee, and I am frank to say that, in my judgment, the figures as embodied in that report do not demonstrate the necessity of reaching down below the age of 20 years for this army.

I fear I have made somewhat of a nuisance of myself by addressing inquiries to members of the Senate Military Affairs Committee, asking them in all seriousness to enlighten me upon the question of why it is necessary, in view of this testimony, to go below 20 years of age; and, Mr. President, no member of that committee has given me one particle of satisfaction. I have been referred to Gen. Crowder, and have been referred elsewhere; but that committee has not yet laid before the Senate anything in the way of information that will satisfy any reasonable man who can perform the grammar-school act of addition as to why we ought to go below 20 years of age.

I made my calculation based upon the figures in that hearing. I reached the conclusion—and it took no expert to guide me in this conclusion, because the simple process was one of addition and subtraction—that we did not have to go below 20. In my extreme anxiety, however, to go right in this matter I called this morning upon the gentleman in the War Department who I think is best informed about those figures and he demonstrated to me that it is necessary to make some rectification in the reported figures. As the result of what he told me I am persuaded that the only safe course for me to pursue as a Senator of the United States is to resolve all doubts in favor of the Army; and, resolving all those doubts in favor of the Army, I can not vote to seize 18-year-old boys. I am extremely liberal if I vote to take a 19-year-old boy. I shall, however, in order to be on the safe side, in the light of my recent information, vote for the 19 to 45 limits.

To me, Mr. President, it is shocking to take an 18-year-old boy from an American family and put him into the welter of this world war. I would do it if it were necessary; I would do anything if it were necessary; but to seize a boy in his knickerbockers, so to speak—a boy who is regarded by his parents as yet at that age when he can not be out at night without their knowing where he is—is so shocking to me that under no circumstances would I do it until somebody who ought to be here to speak demonstrates by cold figures that it is necessary.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I desire to submit an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from California is not in order at this time, as there is an amendment in the second degree pending.

Mr. PHELAN. May I have the amendment read for the information of the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment for the information of the Senate.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from California will propose the following amendment: Add a new section, to be known as section 9, as follows:

SEC. 9. So much of "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919," approved July 9, 1918, and reading as follows:

"That any and all members of the military forces of the United States serving in the present war be, and they are hereby, permitted and authorized to accept during the present war or within 1 year thereafter, from the Government of any of the countries engaged in war with any country with which the United States is or shall be concurrently likewise engaged in war, such decorations, when tendered, as are conferred by such Government upon the members of its own military forces; and the consent of Congress required therefor by clause 8 of section 9 of Article I of the Constitution is hereby expressed granted: Provided, That any officer or enlisted man of the military forces of the United States is hereby authorized to accept and wear any medal or decoration heretofore bestowed by the Government of any of the nations concurrently engaged with the United States in the present war.

"That the President is authorized, under regulations to be prescribed by him, to confer such medals and decorations as may be authorized in the military service of the United States upon officers and enlisted men of the military forces of the countries concurrently engaged with the United States in the present war."

Be, and is hereby, repealed.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California.

Mr. PHELAN. The principle involved in that amendment——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, a point of order. Nothing can be done now, with the exception of considering the amendments that are before the Senate, except by unanimous consent. Now, I object. I want to vote on these amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from California will await its turn for voting. The Senator from California was recognized, presumably for the purpose of speaking on the pending amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not understand that the Chair had recognized him.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, the principle involved in my amendment can be stated very briefly. Last year the Congress generously provided for medals of honor to be awarded its men by the United States for special acts of bravery. The United States has failed in nothing to reward and stimulate meritorious acts; but in order to overcome the inhibition of the Constitution, forbidding its men to accept foreign decorations, the provision which I now seek to repeal somehow crept into the military bill, and, I believe, thoughtlessly. Let me read the provision of the Constitution, Article I, section 9:

No title of nobility shall be granted by the United States; and no person holding any office of profit or trust under them shall, without the consent of the Congress, accept of any present, emolument, office, or title of any kind whatever from any king, prince, or foreign State.

But here is an attempt to give a blanket consent to our military forces, both of the Army and Navy, to accept honors conferred by king, prince, or foreign State. The Constitution provides that such things shall not be done without the consent of Congress, manifestly meaning, in the judgment of the makers of the Constitution, in all human probability, that special consent should be given in individual cases. That would have been a great honor—two countries concurring.

Pursuant to that act of Congress giving general consent, the United States is obliged to now acquiesce in any selection. The order of Grand Knight Commander of the order of the Bath, I believe, has been conferred upon Gen. Pershing, and Grand Knight Commander of the order of St. Michael and St. George has been conferred upon Gen. Bliss, Gen. March, Vice Admiral Sims, Rear Admiral Rodman, and Rear Admiral Strauss. These are not medals, they are titles of knighthood. That is the extent, so far as I am advised by the department, of the conferring of these honors—except the distinguished-service order to Lieut. Commander Carpendor—and I submit that it should rest there. These are our great commanders. If any evil has been done, it is well that there be an end of it; and, as the honors have been conferred upon worthy men, there is no reason for complaint, except from those who object as un-American to the conferring of titles, medals, presents, or emoluments upon any American citizen by a foreign Government. The only palliation would be in specially honoring our citizens with war medals, not knighthoods, while in the service of a foreign State, and before we entered the war; and that is provided for and is not being disturbed.

My objection to the practice is that it is un-American. It is repugnant to the Constitution and hateful to the fathers of the country, and where there has been any departure from the Constitution it has been only by special consent of Congress. Even Canada has revolted against it. We are told by Lord Robert Cecil that there are 22 States in the commercial compact now, indicating that there are 22 sovereignties that are interested in winning this war, and I suppose under this provision, if unrepealed, each of these sovereignties will compete with the others in conferring honors, emoluments, and titles upon our brave commanders. What a spectacle for a democracy! Then there is the evil to the commanders themselves, as we know that from our executive and legislative experience, of the seeking by devious means the possession of such honors. I can not imagine anything that would be more demoralizing to the service, but I have in mind also the period after the war, when we will find many men eminent in the service of the United States under obligation to foreign Governments for these honors, titles, and emoluments. We want no temptations to a double allegiance, no lukewarm Americans. Perhaps we may have in good faith to salute these gentlemen as "Sir This" and "Sir That." Why not? You can see how utterly repugnant it is to our American ideas and to American institutions, and, indeed, to American laws.

I therefore submit, for the betterment of the service, in order to cut out possibly any manifestation after the war of undue snobbishness on the part of the men and jealousies on the part of others in the service, and in order to have our Americans come back Americans, under obligations to no foreign Government, that the amendment which I present should be adopted. It simply restores the constitutional prohibition and saves possible friction—a thing to be deprecated in the pursuit of either war or peace.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I am aware that the pending amendment possibly may not be accepted by the Senate. In case of its defeat I shall wish to submit the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read the amendment for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided, That steps shall be taken to prevent, so far as possible, the call of men to serve abroad before they attain the age of 19.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the amendment which has just been read is copied literally from the British statute, from the military-service act passed in 1916. This proviso I shall undertake to transport, if occasion arises, into the pending measure.

The pending bill, as I understand, is brought forward in order to carry out an agreement entered into at an interallied war council. It is proposed to carry out our part in supplying an adequate man power at the front to insure early and complete victory. If the interallied war council have resolved that our Army should be 5,000,000 men, then our Army ought to be raised to 5,000,000 men, and that at the earliest practicable moment. We ought to have men enough at the front—the United States and the allies—to assume the offensive. Only the offensive can win; and when the final offensive is assumed we ought to have men enough to take the excessive losses which attend the offensive and still press the offensive to success. Otherwise the slaughter is in large measure waste—waste of the most priceless of all treasure.

Mr. President, necessity is the law of war. Necessity can not be temporized with. We as a people have voluntarily consented not to plead the law of necessity in justification of a breach of international law, not to plead necessity in justification of a breach of the obligations of right and justice and honor and other superior obligations which rest upon and which bind our conscience as a Nation. If the necessity has arisen to draft men between the ages of 31 and 45, that necessity must be obeyed. If the necessity has arisen to draft men between the ages of 20 and 21, that necessity must be obeyed. If the necessity has arisen to draft men between the ages of 19 and 20, then, sir, that necessity will insist upon obedience. If in truth the necessity has arisen to draft men between the ages of 18 and 19, that necessity will be equally imperious; and I take it that if the necessity should come upon us to draft men between the ages of 17 and 18 and men between the ages of 16 and 17, that necessity would also be compiled with. You can not answer necessity with sentiment; but I do not believe—I am not convinced—that the necessity has yet arisen to draft men between the ages of 18 and 19. I doubt if the American people are convinced that the necessity has as yet arisen. If they were convinced, I believe they would comply, if not with good cheer, at least with a sense of duty which was compelling and irresistible.

I know it will be asked, "Who is the best authority as to whether or not this necessity has arisen?" The question will be asked, "Are not the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff the best authority upon this subject?" I am obliged to answer in the affirmative. They, perhaps, are the best authority upon this subject; but, sir, their authority is not conclusive. Their authority is not final. In this country we are entitled to act upon evidence and facts and circumstances and precedent. We are privileged to pass judgment for ourselves, without accepting the authority of anybody as final, certainly upon a subject of this description.

Mr. President, that even the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff are not infallible upon this point has been recently and conclusively demonstrated. About two months ago the Senate was on the verge of adopting an amendment of this character. The Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff came hurrying to the Capitol in order to intercede with the Senate not to adopt that measure; and the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], whose services can not be praised beyond their deserts, vacated his own views and expostulated with the Senate not to adopt that amendment. Now, sir, what has transpired in two months to revolutionize the situation in such a fundamental and far-reaching way as this? The original draft law provided that men as low as the age of 19 should be drafted. The Chief of Staff thought it was desirable then. The event has proven that it was not necessary, even though desirable.

Now, Mr. President, even though the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff recommend this, that is not of necessity binding upon the judgment of Senators. I have just read a speech of Lloyd George, when he was minister of munitions in the cabinet of Premier Asquith, and Lloyd George said in his speech that the man who professes to agree with every word that falls from his leader's lips has already betrayed him. He exclaimed: "Good Heavens! Of what use would I be if I agreed with him in every particular?" He answered his own question by saying, "I would be of no use at all," and he suggested that if men should do that they would degenerate into mere automatons. He said that if he was to be a counsellor he would be glad to serve, but that if he were to play the part of a "penny-in-the-slot machine" he had no taste, no ambition, for such a part.

But I think not only have the Chief of Staff and the Secretary of War failed to demonstrate the necessity of this measure, but the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and others have demonstrated that the necessity does not exist.

Great Britain, with a population of 47,000,000, raised an army of 5,000,000 before drafting men under the age of 19, and raised an army of six and a half millions before sending those below the age of 19 to the front. We have 110,000,000 of people. Our quota is 5,000,000. Can we not raise an army of 5,000,000 of men out of a population of 110,000,000 without invading the nursery and without robbing the cradle?

Mr. President, there is a great deal of force, in my judgment, in the argument that men should not be drafted before they are 21, before they have a right to vote as sovereign citizens of this Republic. That, I say, is a strong argument, but it must be admitted that it is not a controlling argument. But, sir, in the proposition to draft youths of 18 there is something shocking to the sensibilities. It is urged that they make the best soldiers. I believe they do. That fact, sir, is due to the inexperience and to the indiscretion of youth. Shall we take advantage of a limitation for which they are in no wise responsible?

There is something in this proposal to draft boys of 18 that makes one think of robbing a bird's nest. We impute to the Germans as a grievous fault that they are destitute of sentiment, that they are devoid of the finer sensibilities, that they lack the finer feelings which not only characterize but which constitute the civilized man. France has responded to those finer sensibilities, and, in legislative enactment, has provided that youths under 19 shall not be taken until the necessity arises—not upon the assurance of the prime minister or the minister of war, but they wrote it into the law. In the public prints to-day I see it charged against the Germans that they are cold-blooded in their calculations and destitute of sentiment and sensibilities. The English have written a provision into their law that youths below 19 years of age shall not be drafted until the national necessity is imperious. Let us emulate the example of France and Great Britain. Let us exhibit the same solicitude and extend the same protection to our youths that they extended to theirs until the summons of necessity was imperious and uncompromising.

Mr. President, it is sentiment which constitutes the better part of human nature and human life. It is sentiment which binds the mother to her babe, and impels her to lay down her own life to save the life of her children. It is sentiment which impels us to march in mournful procession to the grave, and to inter with fitting ceremonials the ashes of our departed friends. It is sentiment which impels us to erect enduring monuments to the memory of the mighty and sceptered dead, whose spirits still rule us from their sacred urns. Let us not surrender the most sacred sentiments of the human heart to a less imperious challenge than that of necessity.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 4 o'clock having arrived, further debate is not in order. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY].

Mr. VARDAMAN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I offer the following substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, inserting "nineteen" instead of "twenty."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Making the minimum age limit for the draft 19 years.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. A number of us do not understand just what the question is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the proposed substitute.

The SECRETARY. To make the minimum age limit for the draft 19 years.

Mr. VARDAMAN. It is an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is not clear yet what is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas and what is the amendment proposed to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas and the amendment to the amendment on which the vote is about to be taken.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Arkansas offers the following amendment: Strike out the word "eighteen," in line 3, page 7, and line 1, page 9, and insert in lieu thereof the word "twenty"; on page 10, line 17, strike out the word "eighteenth" and insert the word "twentieth"; and on page 11, line 1, strike out the word "eighteen" and insert the word "twenty."

The Senator from Washington offers as a substitute the following: On page 7, line 3, strike out "eighteen" and insert "nineteen"; on page 9, line 1, strike out "eighteen" and insert "nineteen"; on page 10, line 17, strike out "eighteenth" and insert "nineteenth"; on page 11, line 1, strike out "eighteen" and insert "nineteen."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Is not this an amendment in the third degree?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not. Under Rule XVIII of the Senafe it is only in the second degree. The proposed amendment of the committee is an independent proposition. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement of my pair and its transfer that I made on the previous vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). As heretofore announced, I am paired for the day with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. Therefore I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH (when Mr. MYERS's name was called). My colleague [Mr. MYERS] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. SHERMAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON]. I believe I am at liberty to vote, however, on this amendment, and I vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). Not knowing how my pair would vote on this question, I withhold my vote.

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], and I will let this announcement stand for the day. I vote "nay."

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). Making the same transfer of my pair that I made on the previous vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. WOLCOTT (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] and vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 14, nays 58, as follows:

So Mr. POINDEXTER's amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY].

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to know whether it is necessary to reserve a vote on the 19-year-old proposition?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can be offered again in the Senate. It is usual to give notice when a Senator desires such a vote.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I give that notice, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY].

Mr. BORAH. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement that I made on the previous vote I vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH (when Mr. MYERS's name was called). If my colleague [Mr. MYERS] were present he would vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). Making the same announcement of my pair as on the former vote I withhold my vote.

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement of the transfer of my pair as on the last vote I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to make the same announcement of my pair with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] as heretofore and I withhold my vote.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am paired with the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] and withhold my vote. I would vote "nay" if at liberty to vote.

The result was announced—yeas 12, nays 60, as follows:

So Mr. KIRBY's amendment was rejected.

Mr. GORE. I desire to submit to the Senate the amendment of which I gave notice a few minutes ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read it.

The SECRETARY. Insert at the proper place in the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That steps shall be taken to prevent so far as possible the sending of men to serve abroad before they attain the age of 19.

Mr. GORE. Upon that amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

On a division the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KIRBY obtained the floor.

Mr. GORE. In section 4, the line and page I do not recall, after the word "forty-five," where it reads "between the ages of 18 and 45," I move to insert the words "at the date of the approval of this act."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair had recognized the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] and will recognize the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] later.

Mr. KIRBY. If in order, I should like to take the sense of the Senate finally on the matter as between 18 and 19. The way the vote was taken awhile ago was rather between 19 and 20 or 20 and 21. If in order, I would like to move that "19" be substituted in the bill for "18" where it appears and take the vote of the Senate upon it and get through with it one way or the other.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from Arkansas that the Senate decided that question on the substitute offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER].

Mr. KIRBY. The Chair then holds that this question has been determined?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been determined.

Mr. GORE. I send to the desk the amendment which I propose, which will raise the question submitted by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I desire to reserve the right to have a separate vote in the Senate on the question to fix the minimum age limit at 19.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can make that motion in the Senate.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not desire, however, to offer it as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, but for the same reason he stated a moment ago in order to get a square vote on the proposition itself, I desire to offer an amendment in the Senate to the bill itself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can do that. That motion will be entertained by the Chair. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 8, after the colon, insert the following:

A. That whenever the President shall ascertain, determine, and publicly announce that all of said persons above the age of 21 years have been drafted into the military service of the United States as far as consistent with the public interest, he is authorized thereupon to draft any of said persons who are between the ages of 20 and 21 years at the date of the approval of this act in the same manner and to the same extent as if they were 21 years of age and over.

B. Whenever the President shall ascertain, determine, and publicly announce that all said persons over the age of 20 years have been drafted in accordance with this act and the acts of which it is amendatory so far as is consistent with the public interest, he is thereupon authorized to draft any of said persons who were between the ages of 19 and 20 years at the time of the approval of this act in the same manner and to the same extent as if they were 21 years of age and over.

C. Whenever the President shall ascertain, determine, and publicly announce that all said persons over the age of 19 years have been drafted in accordance with this act and the acts of which it is amendatory so far as is consistent with the public interest, he is thereupon authorized to draft any of said persons who were between the ages of 18 and 19 years at the time of the approval of this act in the same manner and to the same extent as if they were 21 years of age and over.

D. Nothing in this section contained shall be construed to prevent the registration, examination, and classification of such persons between the ages of 18 and 21 years as if they were above the age of 21 years, nor to prevent the training of any such persons for a period of six months prior to being finally and formally drafted into the military service.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, on that amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GORE. On page 9, line 2, after the word "inclusive," I move to insert the words "at the date of the approval of this act"; and I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CUMMINS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, line 24, after the words "this act provided," it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, That the registration of male persons between the ages of 31 and 45, inclusive, and 18 and 20, inclusive, shall take place in three groups successively, to wit: First, those between the ages of 31 and 35, inclusive, and of the age of 20; thereafter, and whenever in the judgment of the President more men are necessary for military duty, those between the ages of 36 and 40, inclusive, and of the age of 19; thereafter, and whenever in the judgment of the President still more men are necessary for military duty, those between the ages of 41 and 45, inclusive, and of the age of 18.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. FALL. I send to the desk an amendment which I ask may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert after section 8 a new section as follows:

SEC. 9. Any such person shall be entitled to the same rights under the homestead and other land and mineral entry laws, general or special, as those over 21 years of age now possess under said laws: Provided, That any requirements as to establishment of residence within a limited time shall be suspended as to entry by such person until six months after his discharge from military service: And provided further, That applications for entry may be verified before any officer in the United States or any foreign country authorized to administer oaths by the laws of the State or Territory in which the land may be situated.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am willing to accept that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 13, line 2, after the word "President," it is proposed to insert:

No person subject to registration shall depart from the United States and enter any adjacent foreign country for the purpose of engaging in labor therein and with intent to be absent more than one week without the written consent of an officer or board authorized under the regulations to issue the same.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PENROSE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to be inserted at the proper place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 2 it is proposed to insert the following:

And provided further, That the local boards shall determine in the first instance from the answers in the questionnaire of each registrant whether or not any person is entitled to deferment or exemption without requiring registrants to claim such deferred classification or such exemption.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STERLING. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "prescribe," in line 8, on page 7, it is proposed to insert the following:

Except that persons under the age of 19 years shall not be called into other than military training service.

Mr. STERLING. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota asks for the yeas and nays on his amendment.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, to come in on line 10, page 12, and I call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to it. The bill at that point now reads:

Soldiers and sailors, regardless of age, shall, when they are accepted as volunteers or when they shall have been drafted, be eligible to receive commissions in either the Army or Navy.

I move, after the word "Navy," in line 10, to strike out the period and to add the words "according to the service in which they volunteered or were drafted."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. As it stands it would really authorize a man to enlist in the Navy and to be entitled to a commission in the Army.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 13, after the word "provision," it is proposed to insert the following:

The regulations relating to classification and exemptions shall be so framed that there shall at all times be in civil employments a number of persons sufficient to produce enough to maintain, equip, and transport our military forces, support our civil population, and furnish to the countries cooperating with us in the war the supplies which their necessities demand. And all said regulations shall enforce, in so far as practicable, the duty of every qualified citizen either to labor in a useful way or bear arms in the defense of his country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, there seems to be a misprint in line 13, on page 12, to which I call the attention of the chairman of the committee. The language is:

But shall not be barred from or discriminated against on account of age.

I presume that means "shall not be barred therefrom," referring to schools. The word "from" ought to be changed to "therefrom."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think that is correct; it ought to be "therefrom."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. FRANCE. I offer an amendment, which I ask may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 6, after the word "Act," it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, That under such draft all those between the ages of 18 and 19 years, inclusive, shall be drafted as soon as practicable after the passage of this act, but they shall be drafted only for education and training, military, nonmilitary, or both, either in cantonments or, when advisable, at the expense of the United States Government in military and technical studies in approved educational institutions, or drafted for other forms of noncombatant national service in this country, or for combatant service in this country in an emergency only, but that those under 20 years of age shall not be employed for active military service abroad, and—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PHELAN. I ask for a vote on the amendment I sent to the desk a little while ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the amendment of the Senator from California has already been read.

Mr. PHELAN. The amendment has been read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from California. [Putting the question.] By the sound, the noes seem to have it.

Mr. PHELAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 3, it is proposed to strike out "eighteen" and insert "nineteen"; on page 9, line 1, to strike out "eighteen" and insert "nineteen"; on page 10, line 17, to strike out "eighteenth" and insert "nineteenth"; and on page 11, line 1, to strike out "eighteen" and insert "nineteen."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement concerning my pair and its transfer as heretofore, I vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). I have already announced my pair with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], but, from my conversations with him, I am satisfied that he would vote on this amendment the same as I intend to vote. Therefore, I feel at liberty to vote, and vote "yea."

Mr. SHERMAN (when his name was called). I announce the same pair as heretofore. Not knowing how the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] would vote, I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). Making the same announcement in regard to my pair as heretofore, I withhold my vote.

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 21, nays 52, as follows:

YEAS—21.

Bankhead	Gulon	Norris	Townsend
Borah	Jones, Wash.	Poindexter	Vardaman

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 13, it is proposed to strike out the words "this provision," and insert in lieu thereof the words "these provisions."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. REED, and Mr. McKELLAR called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when Mr. GOFF's name was called). I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. GOFF] is absent on account of illness. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). The junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], with whom I am paired for the day, would vote as I shall vote on the passage of this bill. Therefore I am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. BRANDEGEE (when Mr. McLEAN's name was called). My colleague [Mr. McLEAN] is unavoidably detained from the Senate. He is paired with the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS]. I am authorized by his secretary to state that if he were present he would vote "yea" on the passage of this bill.

Mr. WALSH (when Mr. MYER's name was called). My colleague [Mr. MYERS] is unavoidably absent. He is paired as heretofore announced. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. PENROSE (when his name was called). As this is a final vote, I will again announce that I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. I transfer that pair, by arrangement with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] to my colleague, the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SHERMAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON], who is necessarily absent. I am informed that if present he would vote "yea." Therefore I am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). Knowing that my pair would vote on this bill as I shall vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I make the same transfer that I made on the previous roll calls to-day and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MARTIN. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SWANSON] is detained from the Senate by illness in his family. I wish also to state that the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BENET] telegraphs me that he is detained at home because the primary election is held there to-day and that had he been present he would have voted for the bill on its final passage and also for the draft from 18 to 45.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I am not willing to be the one Senator to stand in the way of a unanimous vote in favor of the passage of this measure. For reasons, however, indicated in part in my remarks—the absence of a demonstrated necessity for drafting men so young as the bill provides and the conclusive demonstration to my own mind that the necessity has not arisen—I can not prevail upon myself to vote in favor of its passage. In order, therefore, that the RECORD may exhibit to the allies, the world, and the enemy a unanimous vote indicating a united purpose, shared by us all, to win the war, I request the Senate to excuse me from voting, under Rule XII.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the Senator, for the reasons assigned by him, be excused from voting? [Putting the question.] Leave is given the Senator to refrain from voting.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask to have printed in the RECORD a telegram from the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], with whom I am paired, showing how he would vote on this question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The telegram is as follows:

PELHAM, GA., August 14, 1918.

Senator CHARLES CURTIS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

I can not get back to Washington until after September 11. I am in favor of raising draft age to 45, but unalterably opposed to lowering it below 21.

THOMAS W. HARDWICK,
United States Senator.

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON], on account of important business. I wish also to announce the absence of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], on account of illness in his family.

The roll call resulted—yeas 75, nays 0, as follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate having voted unanimously to pass the bill, the bill is passed. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House upon the bill and amendment, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, before the motion is put I want to say just a word.

This bill contains a provision that has passed the Senate now four times. It has never yet been voted upon in the House. I refer to the provision with reference to furnishing uniforms to officers. I think it fair to say to the chairman of the committee that if the conferees bring in a report excluding that provision I shall ask the Senate to reject the report, so as to give the House at least an opportunity to express its judgment upon it before a final conclusion is reached.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, when I offered the amendment which was adopted a short time ago, I did not have an opportunity to call the attention of the Senate to it. I refer to the amendment which permits the local draft boards to grant exemptions or deferred classifications, without a formal request, upon the answers in the questionnaire. I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to it especially, as I think it a very just and equitable measure.

In order to perfect the record, I desire to state that this amendment was offered at the suggestion of a gentleman in Pennsylvania, an Army officer, who has had very wide experience in the registration work of that great Commonwealth. He says:

In accordance with our telephone conversation of this afternoon, I would strongly urge that when the draft bill comes up in the United States Senate you urge its being so drawn as not to make it necessary for a man to claim deferred classification. The boards should determine, from the answers in the questionnaire, whether or not the man is entitled to deferment. This would relieve registrants who are entitled to deferred classification from the probable embarrassment of having to claim it.

At the present time, while the boards pass on the validity of the claim, yet the man himself must put in his claim in his questionnaire. There will be a great many more men entitled to deferred classification between the ages of 31 and 45 than was the case between the ages of 21 to 30. I have heard a great many men say that while they believe they should have deferred classification they would not claim it, as they in a way feel that they would be slackers by doing so.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, a few moments ago the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] made reference to the amendment which was inserted in this bill authorizing and requiring the Government to sell uniforms to officers at cost. I most heartily concur in that amendment; and, as one Senator, I want to appeal to the conferees who may be appointed to insist upon its being retained in the bill. A bill of that character passed the Senate some time ago, and for some reason has not been passed by the House. I have before me now a letter from the father of one of these young boys who got a commission in the aviation branch of the service, and he tells me that he was compelled to pay about $700 for the uniforms which were required. His law partner had a similar experience. For an overcoat that ordinarily is furnished by the Government to the private soldier at a cost of $14 or $15 he was compelled to pay $50, and the charges for boots and for other articles of apparel are similarly excessive. I do not understand them. I should like to see one other amendment added to this bill, and that is to the effect that those who have been profiteering in the charges that they have made for these clothes should themselves be sent to the trenches. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will not warn the occupants of the galleries again. No demonstration of applause is permitted, and he will have to order the galleries cleared if this occurs again. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Oregon that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendment, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. HITCHCOCK, and Mr. WARREN conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I move that Senate bill 4856 be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

STIMULATION OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Chair lay before the Senate the unfinished business, House bill 11945.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it consistent with the unanimous-consent agreement to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which was temporarily laid aside.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11945) to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purposes of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products."

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 5 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, August 27, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in Heaven, impart unto us, we pray Thee, grace sufficient unto the needs of the day; wisdom unto these Representatives of a great people to guide them in all their legislative acts; patriotism unto the American people, so pure, so deep, so broad, so strong, that we, in conjunction with our allies, may gain the war for humanity; in His name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MOTION TO DISCHARGE A COMMITTEE.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. There has been pending in the Committee on Agriculture for several months a bill introduced by my colleague, Mr. AYRES, of Kansas, a resolution fixing the price generally on articles enumerated in the bill. No action has been taken in the committee. Repeated attempts have been made by members of the committee, including myself, to get action upon it. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES] has filed a motion to discharge the Committee on Agriculture from further consideration of the resolution No. 253. Query: When would it be in order to ask for recognition on his motion to discharge the committee?

The SPEAKER. It can not be done except on the first and third Mondays, and it could not be done then until the whole Unanimous Consent Calendar has been disposed of and motions to suspend the rules are disposed of. It comes third in order. If we ever get a chance to clear up the Calendar for Unanimous Consent and there are not enough motions to suspend the rules to take up the balance of the time, then that particular list of motions will be taken up; I do not know how many are pending.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It could not be taken up prior to that time except by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. No. The Clerk informs me that there are 35 motions on the list.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The only way it could be taken up is by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. Yes; and that is very doubtful. The Chair would have to look into that and see whether it could be done. A former Speaker, Mr. CANNON, once announced that you could put anything through the House by unanimous consent, even an elephant, but the Chair doubts very much the correctness of that decision.

PAIRS.

The Chair wishes to make a further statement. Two or three times lately there has been a sort of commotion about pairs. The Chair has stated half a dozen times that the Chair has nothing on earth to do with pairs and neither has the House except as stated in the rules. The other morning the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] asked unanimous consent that the Speaker inform the pair clerks that they must not pass up any pairs except those signed by the Members. That is precisely what the rule provides now. It is one of those things that the Chair does not have always in mind unless attention is called to it. The rule provides:

Pairs shall be announced by the Clerk after the completion of the second roll call from a written list furnished him and signed by the Member making the statement to the Clerk, which list shall be published in the RECORD as a part of the proceedings, immediately following the names of those not voting, provided pairs shall be announced but once during the same legislative day.

And then in Rule XV it provides—and thereafter the Speaker will not entertain a request to record a vote or announce a pair unless the Member's name has been noted under clause 3 of this rule.

The Chair knows, and everybody else knows, that as a matter of practice a Member will go to the pair clerk and say, "Pair me with Representative Jones, Smith, or Brown," or whoever the Member may be. The difficulty about the pair business comes where the pairs do not indicate which way the Member would vote if he was here. The Chair does not see how a man can tell what is going to come up in the three or four weeks that he may be absent when making a pair for that length of time. He can not go off and expect the pair clerk to know how he would vote. In the opinion of the Chair the whole thing is a nuisance.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the Chair allow an interruption?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. The Chair would not interpret that rule to require a Member himself to sign a request for each individual pair? If he knows he is going to be absent for a definite length of time he leaves general authority to be paired on all questions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair read the rule, and it is plain as day. In old times, when everything was political, Democrats and Republicans, two Members could make a pair, and the clerk would know that the Republican voted with the Republicans and the Democrat with the Democrats, but lately you can not tell "tother from which." [Laughter.] And many times they are not very far apart.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask what amount of time is to be taken up by speeches to-day for which unanimous consent has been given.

The SPEAKER. Two hours and ten minutes.

Mr. SIMS. It would not be in order for me to move to go into Committee of the Whole until that time has been consumed?

The SPEAKER. No.

Mr. SIMS. I am very busy in the hearings on the war emergency power bill. I hope there will be no requests for further speeches to-day by unanimous consent and let us continue the consideration of the water-power bill.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman intend to sit here and listen to the speeches?

Mr. SIMS. I have just stated to the gentleman that I am very busy in the committee hearing on the emergency power bill.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, I thought the gentleman meant that he was going to adjourn his hearings.

Mr. SIMS. Oh, no. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I shall return about 2 o'clock to move that the House go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the water-power bill, and will do so so soon as the speeches set for this morning are concluded. I hope that no other gentleman will make a request in my absence to be permitted to address the House.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HADLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague, Mr. LA FOLLETTE, be granted indefinite leave of absence, on account of illness in his family.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent for indefinite leave of absence for his colleague, Mr. LA FOLLETTE, on account of sickness in his family. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

JESSIE T. LOVELL.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report (H. Rept. No. 761) from the Committee on Accounts, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 423.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to Jessie T. Lovell, clerk to James H. Davidson, a Representative from the State of Wisconsin at the time of his death, August 6, 1918, the sum of $166.66, being an amount equal to one month's salary of a clerk of a Representative in Congress.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Georgia if this is the usual practice?

Mr. PARK. It is.

The resolution was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN], I believe, is first in order in remarks that are to be made to-day. Mr. HAMLIN is a gentleman who has had a long and distinguished career here in the House, and I know his remarks will be of very great interest to the membership. I think we ought to have a larger attendance, and I therefore make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

THE JUVENILE COURT (H. DOC. NO. 1265).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States which was read, and with the accompanying papers referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the information of the Congress the reports of the clerk and chief probation officer of the Juvenile Court of the District of Columbia for the two years ended June 30, 1917.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
27 August, 1918.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 12704) to authorize the importation without the payment of duty of sundry articles for the American National Red Cross to be donated or used by it solely to or for the benefit of the land or naval forces of the United States or its allies, or for the relief of the civilian population of the United States or of its allies.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 12704. An act to authorize the importation without the payment of duty of sundry articles for the American National Red Cross to be donated or used by it solely to or for the benefit of the land or naval forces of the United States or its allies, or for the relief of the civilian population of the United States or of its allies.

THE CHARACTER AND PATRIOTISM OF THE MEMBERSHIP OF THE HOUSE.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker and colleagues, as a result of the recent primary in my State I will not be a Member of the House after March 4 next. Therefore no sinister or selfish purpose can be attributed to me in what I shall say on this occasion. Neither can it be called in any sense a "swan song," for I undertake to say that no man has quit the service in this House with less bitterness in his soul or with a less feeling of chagrin than I will.

For the last 16 years I have been in one continuous political battle. For eight consecutive terms I have been the nominee of my party and have been elected to this House seven times, and each time I have had to fight both for the nomination and election. The people of my district have been good to me. They have kept me here, under the adverse circumstances mentioned, longer than any man who ever represented the district, and therefore it is with a feeling of relief rather than grief that I retire to private life.

The only regret I have is the severing of the delightful ties of friendship which I have been able to form with Members of the House—representative men from every part of these United States. In this, however, I will be the only loser, for in my successor you will find a big-hearted, whole-souled, likable fellow, whom to know will be to love, and you will therefore too soon forget that I have ever been here.

This, however, is not the purpose of my addressing you at this time. Now that the situation is changed and that I can not be accused of selfish reasons, I want to combat and denounce as best I may the libelous criticisms of Congress gratuitously made by a few yellow papers and other publications throughout the country directed against the whole membership of Congress.

There are a few papers printed in the large cities of the country, but which find an echo here and there in the papers of some of the smaller towns, that are not, in fact, patriotic and that have not courage enough to show their real colors, but that seek to cripple and hinder the prosecution of this war by bringing into disrepute and distrust by the vilest misrepresentations the legislative branch of the Government.

The columns of these publications are filled with hypocritical protestations of loyalty to our Government in these hours of stress and trouble, but they are also filled with an indictment of the whole membership of the lawmaking body by characterizing them as unintelligent, unscrupulous, unpatriotic, and, in fact, slackers. They say Congress has not done and will not do anything toward helping to win this war except such things as it is forced to do under the lash of public opinion. In other words, these pro-German publications—for they are nothing else—seek, under the guise of high-powered patriotism upon their part, to poison the minds of the people and create distrust and lack of confidence in the lawmaking body of their country, and in doing that believe that they can effectively cripple the prosecution of the war. This is not only unjustified and wrong but is infamous. There may be some men in Congress who ought not to be here, but I undertake to say that I do not believe that 533 men composing the membership of the House and Senate can be gotten together from the body of the people, or from any particular class of the people even, who would represent a higher order of intelligence, probity, and patriotism than those who now constitute or do constitute from time to time the membership of the great lawmaking body of our country. Of this I am sure: It has never been my privilege to come into contact with men possessed of purer motives, higher ideals, or more patriotic purposes than those composing the Congress of the United States from time to time. The fact is they are so far above the slimy creatures who seek to traduce them that it is a shame to mention both in the same connection.

Not to refute this calumny, for the intelligence of the country will do that, but that the truth may be known, let us see if the records bear out or even lend color to the statement that Congress is unpatriotic or neglectful of their country's interest in these times of stress. In other words, is it true that Congress does nothing?

When we declared war on Germany we had practically no army, no equipment, and no ships. On the 6th of April, 1917, when the declaration of war was made, we found ourselves in the position of being at war with the greatest military machine in the world and with an army numbering approximately only about 100,000 men. Within 15 months from that time we had in uniform, fully equipped, comfortably housed, in training, and upon the battle field 3,000,000 as brave boys as ever went to battle. [Applause.] When we declared war we had no ships—for years we had depended upon foreign ships to do our overseas carrying—but since that time we have builded shipyards and extended others and have been able to launch already more ships flying the Stars and Stripes than we had launched in any 10 years of our previous history. Within that time we have transported and have on the plains of France 1,500,000 of the best fighters that ever went to battle, as evidenced by the fact that the ruthless Hun started back toward Berlin as soon as a small contingent of our soldiers appeared in the front-line trenches. And yet these yellow pro-German publications have the audacity to tell the people that Congress has done nothing. The truth is not one pound of powder could have been made available, not one gun made, not one shell manufactured, not one boy put in uniform, not one soldier transported beyond the seas, not one wheel turned if Congress had not first enacted the laws providing for the same and had not made available the money for which to carry on this work. And yet in the face of these facts these infamous, slanderous sheets say Congress is unpatriotic and neglectful of their country's interest.

I undertake to say that no country since history was first written ever prepared an army so well and in so short a time and never transported across 3,000 miles of sea, infested with the deadly submarine and treacherous mine, 1,500,000 men without practically the loss of a single one, or so well provided for its soldiers and their dependents as has this war Congress. And yet these libelous journals would have the country believe that Congress is in open rebellion against the executive department and will not support it in this time of war. Let me give you a sample of some of this infamous misrepresentation. I read an extract from one of these yellow journals published in my district headed:

CONGRESS IN REBELLION.

As a rule, it is better for the country if Congress is in vacation. The President has often shown a disposition to keep Congress away from Washington. Nevertheless, there is certain necessary work for Congress to do. Secretary McAdoo wants revenue legislation of an important character acted on at once. It is necessary for the conduct of the war, yet Congress is almost in rebellion rather than do its plain duty. * * * Congress should be a leader in patriotic work instead of trying to avoid a little effort in the summer months.

And so forth.

This statement is made in the face of the fact that the records will show that Congress has promptly and gladly and almost unanimously enacted every piece of legislation asked by the executive department in the prosecution of this war. It is only fair to say that political lines have been obliterated in Congress; it is impossible in the consideration of war legislation to determine who is a Democrat or who is a Republican. Practically every man has stood shoulder to shoulder and presented a united front in giving the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy—one in whom everybody in and out of Congress has confidence—every and all support requested by him. [Applause.]

I also undertake to say that the history of civilization does not disclose any country in any period of the world that ever provided for its soldier boys in entering a war as well and as generously as this Congress has. It has provided not only for them but for their dependents. Every soldier who dons a uniform and leaves at home a wife or child is assured by an act of Congress that those loved ones will not be neglected. Congress has provided that the private soldier shall be furnished everything by the Government in the way of food, clothing, and other necessities of life, and that he, if married, shall allot $15 per month of his pay to the support of the wife and child, if any; but when he does this the law enacted also provides that the Government shall add to that allotment $15 per month for the wife, $10 for the first child, $7.50 for the second, $5 per month additional for each additional child. No other country has ever been so generous, and yet they say Congress is unpatriotic and has done nothing. For the unmarried private Congress has said to him: "If you have a dependent father or mother, or sister or brother, and will allot a portion of your pay for their support, the Government will supplement that allotment with a payment each month of $10."

Congress did not stop there, but said to the holders of indebtedness against a soldier, that they can not foreclose or enforce the payment of the indebtedness while the soldier is fighting for his country, and turn his dependents out of doors. And yet they say that Congress has done nothing.

Not only that, but realizing that the very best blood of the nation was being suddenly placed in hazardous employment and could not therefore obtain insurance in the usual way at reasonable prices, it being ascertained that insurance on the lives of such boys as are taken in the Army could be carried in peace times at $8 per $1,000 per year, but would cost in war times $58 per $1,000, Congress said that it would not be right to force these young men into this hazardous employment and then penalize them by compelling them to pay $58 instead of $8 per $1,000 per year insurance by reason of their situation. Consequently, Congress provided by law for the organization in the Treasury Department of an insurance bureau, enabling these boys to provide for the future by taking insurance from $1,000 to $10,000 at $8 per $1,000 per year, the amount required in ordinary peace times, and that the Government would carry the extra risk of $50 per $1,000 occasioned by the war. No other country in the history of the world has ever done this and yet these pro-German publications say that Congress has done nothing.

Congress has made available not only millions, but billions of dollars in the prosecution of this war. In order to do so, it has been necessary to call upon the people to generously loan to Uncle Sam all the money that they can possibly spare, for which he gives his bond, behind everyone of which is pledged all the resources and the manhood of the richest and greatest democracy on earth. In addition to that it is necessary for taxes to be laid upon the people, heavier, perhaps, than in the history of the country before, but fully justified by conditions, for everyone realizes that the very existence of our Government is in the balance, and the man who is not willing to make sacrifices for his country does not deserve to have a country. Any man who is not willing to defend the Stars and Stripes with every dollar that he possesses and every drop of his blood, if necessary, ought to leave the country and not longer disgrace it with the claim of citizenship.

I have a suspicion that in this very question of taxes may be found the motive for these misrepresentations and indictment of the patriotism of Congress. For years and years some of these publications, at least, have been receiving a bonus from the Government. Their effusions have been carried through the mails of the United States for years at a net loss of about 7 to 8 cents per pound, amounting to millions of dollars each year, which the taxpayers of the country have had to contribute. Some time ago Congress concluded that in these times of trouble, when everybody ought to do his duty, to increase in a small way the postage on this second-class mail matter. Immediately there was set in motion a propaganda denouncing Congress, and every Member has been bombarded with letters and telegrams, many of them from good citizens, who were induced to send them under a misapprehension of the facts, protesting against this increase of second-class postage. Many of these same publications which are now denouncing Congress as unpatriotic and as slackers are not patriotic enough to pay even a small modicum of the expense that the Government is put to in distributing their literature over the country. In my opinion this is the secret, very largely, of their attack.

Whatever purpose these publications had in attempting to indict the whole of Congress, it was unjustified. When the life of our country is hanging in the balance, the man who would attempt to cause distrust and lack of confidence in those in authority, when the facts do not justify it, is an infernal traitor and ought to be treated as such. They may try to call it politics, but there can be no politics among patriots when the life of the country is at stake. Politics, as stated by the President, must under these circumstances "stand adjourned." In ordinary peace times we can have our political bouts both here on this floor and out on the hustings, and who is there that does not enjoy it? But now that we are in the midst of a great struggle for existence we must forget politics. I can only hope that the men here who have so loyally and patriotically supported the Nation in these dark hours shall have the approval of the patriots of their respective districts by being returned to their places in November. And it makes no difference whether you sit upon the east or west side of this House. May I not also hope—in fact, may I not predict with all confidence—that our present great Speaker, than whom no fairer or more competent man ever presided over the deliberations of this House, may be reelected to that position in the new Congress, regardless of the results throughout the country in November?

If you gentlemen can be returned and the organization left undisturbed, so that the well-oiled machinery may continue to run without disturbance, and the Department of Justice will get busy and enforce the espionage law as it may be enforced and thereby rid this country of all anti-Americanism, then, and not until then, will we be doing simple justice by the boys who are so valiantly giving their lives that we may continue to have a country in which to live. To this let us dedicate all our energies, all our time, and our lives, if necessary. [Applause.]

THE FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DEWALT). The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the Congress of the United States has from time to time enacted laws creating commissions for the regulation of certain branches of the Government and the activities of the business industries of the country, and among these commissions is one known as the Federal Trade Commission, created in 1914. The object of the creation of that commission, as I understood it and as I think the American people understood it, was to so regulate the conduct of the business of the country that there would be no monopoly in any line of trade and that combinations in the restraint of trade might be discovered and prosecuted and such combinations dissolved. In a recent investigation of the packing industry of the United States the Federal Trade Commission made serious charges against five of the great packing institutions, Armour & Co., Swift & Co., Morris & Co., Wilson & Co., and others. They charged them with all kinds of crimes and misdemeanors. They made every kind of investigation that it was possible for them to make under the extensive powers granted to this commission by the law. They exploited the commission and its members for political reasons more than they exploited the iniquities of the institutions whose crimes, or purported crimes, they pretended to investigate.

They made every kind of a charge, and when they failed to prove the charge they withdrew or ignored them. They undertook to break into the safe of the people whose business they were investigating. They did that without warrant of law. The courts held that they had no right to do the things which they undertook to do. This commission has proved itself not only to be a menace to the people of the United States but to be unworthy of confidence. They have not proved one charge made against the institutions that I have indicated. They not only have not proved the charges, but in making their reports they have ignored their charges. If the charges they made were true they should have been prosecuted. Have they done so? Not at all. What is it that they have done? They have recommended to the President of the United States that the subsidiary activities of the packing industries of the United States shall be taken over by the Government. They want the refrigerating plants taken over; they want the retail meat markets in the various sections of the United States taken over and run by the Government. They claim that the railroad companies are in combination in restraint of trade with the packers. They have not proved it. They ignore the charge in their recommendations. The recommendations have taken no account whatever of the charges made. They have exploited themselves for the political advancement of the individual members of the commission. They have degenerated into a Bolsheviki organization. They are no longer representative of the idea that was conveyed in the enactment of the law. They no longer speak for the conservative wisdom of the American people.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. The commission ought to be abolished, or its personnel should be changed. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PLATT. I want to ask the gentleman whether one of the chief duties was not the furnishing of candidates for the United States Senate?

Mr. MADDEN. They had that as one of the objects of the investigation. They took a man named Heney, I think, from California, who tried the case he was employed to investigate in the newspapers, who made new charges every morning through the columns of the press. He received, I understand, $18,860 from the Government Treasury as compensation for seven months and six days' services, and he finally announced himself as a candidate for governor of California while the case was pending. Now, what other members of the board have become candidates for office I do not know, but I do assert that there are members of the board who would resort to anything if they could get their names in the headlines of the newspaper.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman remember that a member named Davies became a candidate, with the President's indorsement, for Senator in the State of Wisconsin?

Mr. MADDEN. He was not a member of the commission when the report I am speaking about was sent here, but he was a member of the commission when the investigation was on.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Well, apart from the President's indorsement of him as a Democratic candidate for Senator, was not one of the things said to his credit as a public man that he had been a member of the Federal Trade Commission?

Mr. MADDEN. The President stated that he stood against the McLemore resolution. I do not see how he could have stood against the McLemore resolution when the fact was that he was not a Member of either House.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman recall that a great fight has been waging in the State of Georgia and that the senatorial timber recommended by the President and now making a campaign against the sitting Member is one Harris, formerly Director of the Census, and subsequently a member of the Federal Trade Commission?

Mr. MADDEN. I recall that, but I do not want to have my talk degenerate into a political talk. [Applause.] I want to be understood as presenting this case on the theory that the Federal Trade Commission is organized for the purpose of regulating businesses of the United States in a judicial way. I want to be understood in presenting this case that I do so as a protest against the methods of the Federal Trade Commission. I present the protest because I am opposed to any commission created to regulate the business of the country conducting its affairs along political lines. It should be nonpartisan, it should be unbiased, it should be just, it should be fair, it should be decent, it should be representative as the conservative thought of the American people.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. So long as the gentleman has made that declaration, which I think is highly commendable, will he permit me to say that my observation was no imputation against the gentleman's desire to keep politics out of his speech. The whole matter was introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] and was logically followed up by the question by the gentleman from Pennsylvania——

Mr. MADDEN. I do——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. So the fault is not with the gentleman from Illinois. The subject was introduced by the gentleman from New York, but I trust the gentleman will not take it out of the RECORD, because it may prove to be valuable reading matter in the further consideration of this theme, especially if the gentleman will permit me to add to the Federal Trade Commission list the name of David J. Lewis, of Maryland, who was appointed to the commission by the President after he had made a fight for Senator and lost.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course I have not the right to take out of the RECORD any statement made by a gentleman which I permit him to make in response to an inquiry.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I refuse to yield. Now, I want to say once for all that the Federal Trade Commission in the investigation of the subject matter to which I have alluded has ignored completely the fact that the packing industries of the United States have been under the control of the Government of the United States since 1917; that the railroads of the United States, against whom they charge the packers with being in coalition, are also under the control of the Government of the United States. I wish to call the attention of the Federal Trade Commission also to the fact that the packing industry of the United States is engaged in one of the most important war works of this country. They are doing a thing that is more essential to the successful conduct of the war than any other similar institution in the country. They are engaged in a line of business in which every man, woman, and child in America is interested.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Not just at the moment. And I maintain that the Federal Trade Commission ought not to so conduct its investigations as to throw discredit upon the activities that are engaged in great war work. We are engaged in a great war. I wonder if the Federal Trade Commission understands that. The recommendations which the Federal Trade Commission have made have nothing whatever to do with the war; they have no place in the activities of the business of the country. The Government should not be called upon to run retail meat markets, nor to run refrigerating houses; no business to run the different branches of the packing industries, as suggested by the Federal Trade Commission. Has it got to a place where three or four men appointed by the President to regulate the business of the United States can say to the American people that everything that everybody owns, that all of the activities of the country, must be under and controlled and operated by the Government of the United States if we expect to get the kind of service that we ought to have?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The question I had in mind would come in there now.

Mr. MADDEN. All right.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. To what extent does the Government control the packing industry to-day?

Mr. MADDEN. The Government controls the packing industry to the extent that they limit the amount of profit the packers make to 9 per cent. They control them to the extent that they practically fix the price for all the supplies that the packers buy. The packers own nothing in the way of raw material. They are manufacturers. They have to buy the material from the agricultural producers. Hogs, for example, have been fixed at a certain price; cattle are practically fixed at a certain price, and there is nothing left for these packers to do except to pay the price.

Mr. HAUGEN. It is true, as the gentleman has stated, that the Government has fixed the profit at 9 to 15 per cent——

Mr. MADDEN. At 9 per cent.

Mr. HAUGEN. But the report shows that Morris & Co. were making 263 per cent, which is far in excess of 9 per cent. The four packers made $120,000,000 in one year in excess of the prewar profits.

Mr. MADDEN. When the Federal Trade Commission made a statement of what the packers made last year and compared that with previous profits the commission purposely misstated the facts.

Mr. KNUTSON. Has the gentleman ever tried to sell cattle to the packers at the large terminals?

Mr. MADDEN. Anybody can sell cattle to the packers.

Mr. KNUTSON. Surely they can, if they give them away.

Mr. MADDEN. And they are selling them at higher prices than ever before, and the Government is regulating the whole packing industry. But aside from all that, the main thing is that in the investigation of the packing industry or any other industry the Federal Trade Commission, as a Government agency, should be just and fair. They ought not to make charges that are untrue. If they make the charges and can prove their truth, they ought not to back away from them. They ought to prosecute those against whom they prove charges. They have made charges that are not true and have backed away from them, and they have not prosecuted. And there is not a scintilla of truth in any charge they have made against these great packing industries. [Applause.]

THE INVESTIGATION OF THE PACKERS BY THE FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

This investigation began about August 1, 1917, and a corps of accountants spent several months in going through our cost-keeping records and financial accounts. On the whole, the investigation promised to be a fair one, and the Federal Trade Commission specifically promised that we should be given a fair hearing before any results were published. Aside from the writing of a letter, asking four very general questions, about August 1, 1917, we have been given no opportunity whatever to present our side of the case.

The biased and unfair attitude of the trade commission became evident from the appointment of Francis J. Heney as special attorney. In carrying out his part of the investigation the usual procedure was departed from and ex parte hearings were held in various parts of the country. No attorneys or representatives of the packers were present at these hearings, and the packers' side of the case was never presented in public.

One feature of the Heney hearings was the introduction of correspondence gleaned from the files of the packers. Agents of the commission were permitted to go through the most confidential files of the executives of our company. Letters and fragments of letters were selected in such a way and were read into the record with such misleading and invidious comments, as to give a totally wrong impression of the actions and motives of the company. We doubt if there is a single large corporation which does not contain in its files confidential and offhand comments made by the executives to each other, which could be presented by an unscrupulous lawyer in such a way as to indicate unfair methods and questionable motives. Whereas the agents of the trade commission would seize on one scrap of correspondence that would serve their purposes, they would pass by a hundred bits of correspondence that would show the keen rivalry and competition among the packers and their law-abiding spirit.

The only refusal of permission to examine files during this investigation was that made by Mr. Henry Veeder, attorney for Swift & Co. It is thought by a good many people that Swift & Co. refused access to its vaults, but this is not so. Mr. Veeder is an independent attorney, and has other clients besides Swift & Co. He merely stood on his constitutional rights as a matter of principle in refusing to allow the trade commission agents to go through his private files. He also offered to let them have whatever they were entitled to. The Circuit Court of Appeals and the Supreme Court of the United States upheld Mr. Veeder in his contention.

It is perfectly obvious that political considerations have affected the attitude of the Federal Trade Commission. When Mr. Davies was chairman of the commission he took part in the public hearings that Mr. Heney conducted and resigned in the midst of these hearings to campaign for the senatorship from Wisconsin, using the material from the packer hearings as campaign material. Mr. Heney was an avowed candidate for governor of California. Mr. Harris resigned from the Trade Commission to further his candidacy for senatorship from Georgia. It is rumored that Mr. Victor Murdock wants to become Senator from Kansas. It might also be noted that Mr. Basil Manley, Washington correspondent of the Newspaper Enterprise Association, in which Mr. Colver, chairman of the Trade Commission, is supposed to have an interest, was made a special examiner of the Trade Commission. This newspaper association, together with the group of papers owned by Mr. Colver in the Northwest, represents about the yellowest journalism to be found in the United States.

THE REPORT ON PROFITEERING.

Coming now to the report on profiteering issued by the Trade Commission on June 29, it is generally recognized by the best papers and by bankers and business men that this report is entirely unfair and misleading, and that it offers an extremely dangerous basis for Congress to proceed on with respect to excess-profit taxation.

The most obvious attempt of the Trade Commission to juggle figures is found in the comparison between the three-year aggregate war profit of four large packers and an average one-year profit for the prewar period. The Trade Commission says that the aggregate profit for the three war years was $140,000,000 and that the average profit for the three years before the war was $19,000,000, thus claiming an excess of $121,000,000. This comparison of a three-year profit with a one-year profit is enough to condemn the whole report as misleading and unscientific. Furthermore, a careful scrutiny of the figures shows that the profits enumerated for the three years 1915, 1916, and 1917 as quoted by the Trade Commission do not total $140,000,000, showing that there is an absolute inaccuracy in the figures.

It is also absolutely unfair to speak of $140,000,000 as the aggregate profit for three years without mentioning the fact that this profit was earned on total sales of over four and one-half billion dollars. In other words, the profit was only about three cents on each dollar of sales, and was therefore so small as to have practically no effect on prices. With this fact in mind, the accusation that the packers have "preyed upon the people unconscionably" falls to the ground. It is also misleading and unfair for the Trade Commission to give the impression that this $140,000,000 profit was a clear profit that was pocketed by the owners of the businesses. As a matter of fact, much more than half was returned to the respective businesses of the packers to increase facilities and to finance heavy stocks of goods at extremely high prices. For example, Swift & Co.'s profit during 1917 was $34,000,000; only $10,000,000 of this sum was paid to stockholders in the form of 10 per cent dividends; the remaining $24,000,000 was returned to the business.

Before the war Swift & Co. had to keep about $50,000,000 tied up continuously in stocks of goods in process, in storage, and on the way to market; to-day these inventories run over $150,000,000. Even after putting profits back into the business Swift & Co. has had to issue capital stock to raise additional funds to help finance operations.

Is it right to accuse an industry of profiteering when it reinvests the major part of its earnings to improve facilities, to mantain its efficiency, and to finance operations? American business has been developed largely by reinvestment of earnings, and this is generally conceded to be a praiseworthy method. There can be even less question about this practice in an industry like the packing business, where the profits on sales are so small that if they were eliminated entirely there would be no noticeable effect on prices. The profit amounts to only a fraction of a cent per pound of product sold.

Another indication of the unfairness of the Trade Commission is the way in which it featured the fact that Morris & Co. earned a profit of 263.7 per cent on its capital stock. It is true that the Trade Commission says that this was equal to a rate of 18.6 per cent on the net worth of the company in 1917; but to even mention the fact that the profit was 263 per cent on the small nominal capitalization of $3,000,000 is evidence of the commission's desire to present sensational and misleading information. The extent to which the press dispatches throughout the country have featured this 263 per cent, without any explanation, is ample proof that the commission was unjust in presenting the figure the way it did.

In connection with the press dispatches it might also be mentioned that the stories sent broadcast for the newspapers were considerably worse than the report itself. The method in which the press dispatches were prepared might bear looking into. It is also worth while to note that the story was given out on a Saturday noon, at a time when business men are not likely to be on hand to prepare proper statements in reply to sensational and unsupported charges.

The one very serious feature of the report is that on page 7 the packers are accused of having monopolistic control of the meat industry and that they have manipulated the market without regard to law. Absolutely no proof is given of these statements, and the issuance of such sensational charges could have been only for the object of exciting public opinion and playing upon the prejudices that are known to exist. Swift & Co. has no form of agreement with other packers to control prices of live stock or meats. These prices result from open and active competition. Swift & Co. also does its utmost to obey the law. It even has to lean backward to avoid the semblance of infringing on either the spirit or the letter of the law.

One other feature of the Trade Commission's report is the absolute misstatement of facts that it makes with regard to the prices of hides. The report, on page 15, says that "during 1917 the prices of hides, particularly packer hides, were advanced very rapidly, notwithstanding that during the period of advance great supplies of hides were withheld from the public."

As a matter of fact, the prices of hides did not advance during 1917; on the other hand, the general tendency was downward, as shown by the following table of 10 grades of packer hides:

January	$30.34
February	29.71
March	28.43
April	28.11
May	29.74
June	29.91
July	30.35
August	29.81
September	26.34
October	27.41
November	28.46
December	27.55

Although stocks of hides were slightly larger during 1917 than during 1916, this was due to a much larger supply of hides on account of the largest killings of cattle in the history of the country, and to the fact that demand did not keep pace with supply. Swift & Co. sold 20 per cent more hides during 1917 than during 1916, and many sales were made at a loss.

The Federal Trade Commission was designed originally to serve a useful and nonpolitical purpose; it has already been used as a stepping-stone for political aspirants, and it is degenerating into a vehicle for the issuance of sensational and misleading statements about American business.

There can be no objection to a fair statement of war profits on the part of the Government, as a foundation for excess-profit taxation, but there can be no excuse for seizing such an opportunity to discredit honest American business concerns, especially those that have done their utmost, and successfully, to meet war demands.

SWIFT & CO.,
Union Stock Yards, Chicago.

We wish to call your attention to the fact that Swift & Co. has protested to the Federal Trade Commission that its report on war profits for the years 1915, 1916, and 1917, issued June 29, contains unfair and misleading statements about the packing industry.

In this protest, copy of which is inclosed, we call attention to certain unfounded charges and to unfair statistical comparisons. It is a matter of national concern that a department of the Government, established largely to prevent unfair business methods, should itself issue misleading statements and attempt to throw discredit on an honestly conducted industry that has met all emergency war demands promptly and completely.

Swift & Co. has nothing to conceal and fears nothing from unbiased investigation of its finances or impartial appraisal of its conduct.

The unusual economic conditions of the past three years have necessarily resulted in larger than normal profits in the packing industry, as in other industries; but this profit can hardly be considered excessive, because it has been just as essential as has been the largely increased income of the farmer and wage earner.

Our increased profits have been used to help finance large inventories at exceptionally high prices and to build at increasing costs extensions and improvements, which are made necessary largely by unprecedented war demands.

After paying 10 per cent dividends to more than 20,000 stockholders out of the 1917 earnings, Swift & Co. found that, even after putting the balance of its profits back into the business, it has had to issue additional stock in order to raise more money to finance operations and to maintain efficiency; it has also had to increase its borrowings from the banks by over $75,000,000 as compared with prewar times. Whereas Swift & Co.'s inventories were about $50,000,000 before the war, they now run in excess of $150,000,000.

We are, of course, not protesting against excess-profit taxation, nor against fair investigation of war profits, but it would be easy to cripple the packing industry by allowing it an inadequate income. A net profit of $2,000,000 to-day goes no further in furnishing a proper return for investors, in financing heavy inventories, and in allowing for extensions and improvements than a $1,000,000 profit did four years ago.

We wish to call your attention to the fact that the profits mentioned by the Trade Commission were earned prior to November 1, 1917. Since that time the profits on the meat departments of our business have been limited by the Food Administration to 9 per cent of the capital employed, or to about 2 cents on each dollar of sales. Other departments are in competition with manufacturers whose profits are not restricted. Swift & Co. is living up to all Government regulations.

The Trade Commission emphasizes the fact that the aggregate profit of four large packers for the three war years was $140,000,000, a figure that could have been derived by anyone from the published statements of the companies concerned. The commission neglected to mention that this profit was earned on total sales of over $4,500,000,000 and that it amounted to only about 3 cents on each dollar of sales, thus forming a negligible factor in prices.

Respectfully, yours,

———.

CHICAGO, July 1, 1918.

Mr. LEONIDAS L. BRACKEN,
Secretary Federal Trade Commission, Washington, D. C.:

Swift & Co. protests against certain unwarranted statements in the report issued by the Federal Trade Commission on war profits, in that they give the public a false impression regarding the profits and the conduct of the packing business.

Swift & Co. can justify its profits as not only reasonable but necessary for efficient conduct of the business, to finance large inventories at high prices, and to expand facilities at increasing costs.

This report states that the five large packers have a monopoly of the meat industry, and manipulate the market without regard to law. This is a serious charge, unsupported by facts. Swift & Co. is in competition with all other packers, has no control over prices, and the policy of the company is to obey the law.

Packers' profits are unjustly exaggerated by the statement that four large packers made a profit of $140,000,000 during the three war years, as against an average annual profit of $19,000,000 for the three years before the war. This compares a three-year profit with a one-year profit, and the $19,000,000 should have been $57,000,000 to make the comparison just.

It would be fair to the industry if the report had stated that this $140,000,000 profit of four large packers was earned on sales of nearly $5,000,000,000, and amounted to about 3 cents on each dollar of sales

This profit amounts to only a fraction of a cent per pound of product. In view of these facts the packers can not be justly accused of having "preyed upon the public unconscionably." The Trade Commission's report, as a matter of fairness, should have explained this and that it covered transactions prior to establishment of control by the Food Administration in November, 1917. Since that time our profit has been limited to 9 per cent on capital employed in the meat business, equal to about 2 cents on each dollar of sales.

The impression has gone broadcast that license control has been flouted by the packers. Swift & Co. has at all times endeavored to live up to all regulations of the Food Administration, both as regards the handling and marketing of food products and also as to profits.

LOUIS F. SWIFT,
President Swift & Co.

HISTORY OF THE INVESTIGATION OF FILES IN OFFICE OF ALBERT H. AND HENRY VEEDER AFTER THE DISPOSITION OF THE VAULT CASE.

After the decision of the United States Supreme Court, refusing to review the decision of the circuit court of appeals in the vault case, Col. Chantland, chief examiner of the Federal Trade Commission, called upon Mr. Veeder and requested an examination of the papers and documents in his files to which the commission might be entitled. Col. Chantland stated that he would not copy and publish letters which were private in their nature or contained mere gossip and that he would not take original documents from Mr. Veeder's office. It was Mr. Heney's insistence upon doing these very things that caused the resistance to his investigation, and as Mr. Veeder particularly desired once for all to lay at rest the sensational charges that his files contained papers and documents which would show that the packers were in combination in restraint of trade and had committed felonies, he gave the Federal Trade examiners free access to all his files.

Four or five examiners were six days making the examination of Mr. Veeder's files, and at its conclusion they stated that there were not more files they desired to examine. They asked permission to copy a few letters, which Mr. Veeder refused, on the ground that the letters were his personal property and otherwise not subject to the commission's inquiry. The examiners, however, said that they were through and satisfied with their examination.

Twelve days later Col. Chantland again called upon Mr. Veeder and submitted four written demands, addressed to Swift & Co., Louis F. Swift, president, and Henry Veeder, for examination and the right to copy certain specified letters and memoranda, charging that such right had been refused in the previous examination, which was true only as to the right to copy. These demands contained statements that certain files "were empty and bore evidence of having contained a number of papers," apparently overlooking the fact that Mr. Veeder's vault had been under seal or guard of the Federal Trade Commission's examiners or the United States marshals from January 25, 1918, until the conclusion of the examination on May 2, 1918, by the Federal Trade Commission, when the possession of the vault was voluntarily turned over by the examiners to Mr. Veeder with the statement that they were satisfied. Col. Chantland also served upon Swift & Co., Louis F. Swift, president, and Henry Veeder two subpœnas requiring the production before a Federal trade examiner of certain specified letters and memoranda.

Col. Chantland, upon being reminded of the agreement he had made at his first interview, to the effect that any differences of opinion between the trade commission's examiners and Mr. Veeder were to be passed upon by himself and Mr. Veeder's counsel, and upon Mr. Veeder's stating that he was prepared to carry out his part of the agreement, the examination of Mr. Veeder's files by the commission's examiners was resumed on May 17, 1918, and again pronounced completed on May 25, 1918. On this second examination the examiners reexamined many of the files passed in their original investigation as containing no papers relevant or competent to the commission's inquiry, and the examiners requested the privilege of copying a mass of papers from these and additional files, apparently for the purpose of making up in quantity what the papers lacked in probative value.

Upon request of the examiners, Mr. Veeder waived his objections that these papers were largely, if not entirely, his personal property, or otherwise not subject to the commission's inquiry, and permitted the examiners to copy, without exception, all papers which they desired. The papers which were copied were largely descriptive and historical, and none of them even tended to prove the commission of any crimes by the packers.

The fact that since the completion of the examination of the packers' and Mr. Veeder's files the commission's statements have contained only vague and indefinite charges by inference and innuendo instead of direct charges of violations of law would seem to be conclusive proof that the charges made by Mr. Heney originally and from time to time were not justified by the facts.

STATEMENT OF HENRY VEEDER IN REGARD TO RECOMMENDATIONS OF FRANCIS J. HENEY, SPECIAL ATTORNEY FOR THE FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION, FOR ADDITIONAL LEGISLATION PERTAINING TO SEARCH WARRANTS.

FOREWORD.

On February 27, 1918, the Federal Trade Commission transmitted to Congress the recommendation of Francis J. Heney, its special attorney, for an amendment to the search-warrant act of June 15, 1917, which in effect would enable a special agent, with the aid of one United States district judge, to set aside all constitutional guaranties against unreasonable search and seizure, and which would deprive the citizen of any right of appeal, no matter how flagrantly unlawful was the invasion of his rights. This recommendation has been published as Document No. 961 of the House of Representatives.

Inasmuch as the unlawful search and seizure of my law office in Chicago was made the pretext for this remarkable recommendation, I wrote to the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House, the chairmen of the Senate and House Judiciary Committees, and the chairman of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, protesting against the enactment of any such un-American legislation. My letter and the opinion of the United States circuit court of appeals quashing the void warrant upon which my office was raided and searched and my papers seized are printed herewith.

HENERY VEEDER.

CHICAGO, March 20, 1918.

MARCH 11, 1918.

SIR: On February 27, 1918, the Federal Trade Commission transmitted to Congress the recommendation of Mr. Francis J. Heney, one of its attorneys, for an amendment to Title XI of the act of June 15, 1917, commonly known as the search-warrant act. Although there was at that time pending in the United States Circuit Court of Appeals of the Seventh Circuit a proceeding involving a search of all the papers in my law office in the city of Chicago, Mr. Heney used this illegal search of my office on a void warrant as the example which demonstrated the necessity for an amendment to the law.

The story in the next day's papers recited some of the more sensational statements made by Mr. Heney in his letter, and this impelled me, on February 28, to send to the President of the Senate, to the Speaker of the House, and to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee of each House the following telegram:

"Mr. Heney's statement to Congress through the Federal Trade Commission, as reported in the public press to-day, that I am the custodian of many papers which have been used as instrumentalities in the commission of felonies is false and on a par with the conduct of his investigation of the packers, which has been a travesty upon justice and an outrage upon decency. Mr. Heney has shown no respect or regard for the laws he is sworn to enforce, and now that he is compelled to attempt to justify his conduct in the Circuit Court of Appeals of this circuit, he appeals, according to to-day's Associated Press dispatches, to Congress for amendments to the law which will prevent American citizens having free access to the courts of the land to protect the security of their persons, houses, papers, and effects.

I have afforded to the Federal trade examiners and to Mr. Heney full opportunity to examine and copy every book, document, or paper in my files to which they are entitled under the law. Their reply was a search warrant so general and sweeping in its character as to permit a search and seizure of every paper in my office. I have been a practicing lawyer in Chicago for more than 25 years and have numerous clients, many of them individuals and corporations in no wise related to or connected with the packing industry, and the search warrant which I am resisting in the courts permits a search of all of the confidential and privileged communications which have passed between those clients and myself, as well as my purely personal and private papers. I would be false to my clients and to myself if I did not resist such a flagrant, unreasonable search and seizure, which partakes most strongly of the outrageous writs of assistance which in large measure inspired the formation of this independent Government. Members of Congress are entitled to know how the power they place in the hands of bureaucrats is used, and to that end I shall write to you within a few days a plain, truthful statement of how the paper search which Congress authorized in the espionage act, on the representation that it was necessary to search out papers used in aid of a foreign enemy, has been used by Mr. Heney in Chicago in his campaign of backstairs gossip and innuendo to harass patriotic American citizens who are cooperating loyally and wholeheartedly with the United States Government in its conduct of the war.

"Very respectfully,

"HENRY VEEDER."

I have awaited the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals before complying with the promise in my telegram that I would forward a statement of the details of this illegal proceeding. Such a statement very properly should be before you, in view of the request on Congress for an amendment to the law, which request has been printed and circulated as House Document 961. The decision of the Appellate Court was handed down on March 9. A copy is inclosed. It is entitled "Henry Veeder, plaintiff in error, v. United States of America, defendant in error, No. 2591. In the Circuit Court of Appeals, Seventh Circuit."

The court holds that the search-warrant act as passed by Congress clearly observed the limitations of the fourth amendment to the Constitution, but orders the warrant quashed, because, while the law under which the warrant issued is constitutional the principles of natural justice as well as the constitutional and statutory provisions were so outraged and ignored in the procedure by which the warrant was obtained that it was void. The court said in this connection:

"One's person and property must be entitled in an orderly democracy to protection against both mob hysteria and the oppression of agents whom the people have chosen to represent them in the administration of laws which are required by the Constitution to operate upon all persons alike."

Proceeding now to the inception of this extraordinary affair, it appears that the Federal Trade Commission is conducting an investigation of the meat packers. I happen to be general counsel for Swift & Co., one of the larger meat packers, and in January of this year certain examiners of the Federal Trade Commission appeared in my law office, in the city of Chicago, and made known their wish to inspect, examine, and copy certain books and documents in my custody and belonging to my client Swift & Co. Permission was readily granted, and the examiners began their work. It was not long, however, before it developed that the examiners desired to search every file in my office, personal, private, confidential, or privileged, and many of them relating in no way to any legitimate inquiry of the Federal Trade Commission.

For the past 25 years I have been a practicing attorney in Chicago and I have many clients, both corporations and individuals. I could not conceive it to be compatible with my duty to these clients to allow any third person to examine and pry into their affairs merely to gratify suspicion and curiosity. Such a course would violate my duty as an attorney charged with the protection of his clients' privilege, and, accordingly, I notified the chief examiner, a Mr. McIsaac, that while he was at liberty to examine any of the corporate papers of Swift & Co. in my possession, I could not permit him to make an indiscriminate search of all the papers in my office on the pretext that he was looking for papers which, under the Federal Trade Commission act, he was entitled to examine. Wishing, however, to be obliging and accommodating, I informed Mr. McIsaac that I would even allow him to make such an inspection of the other papers in the office as would show him that the papers I refused to allow him to examine were of the character I claimed them to be and were not properly subject to his examination.

For a few days the examiner appeared satisfied with this method, which I carried out in good faith, but he became dissatisfied with this arrangement because it did not permit him to search in his own way all my personal, confidential, private, or privileged papers without any regard to propriety, decency, or color of legal right. When I refused to allow him to do this he broke off the examination, sealed my vault (without any authority of law), and announced that he would await the instructions of the attorney for the Federal Trade Commission, Mr. Francis J. Heney.

From day to day on one excuse or another I was put off with the explanation that Mr. Heney's instructions had failed to arrive, and meanwhile every time I needed a paper from the vault I was compelled to wait until an examiner could be found when the vault would be unsealed by him, and with his permission I would get my own paper after he had inspected it and then the vault would be resealed.

Finally, on February 4, 1918, after the vault had been sealed for several days, I grew tired of this farce and notified Mr. McIsaac that I proposed to have free access to my own vault, and in his presence on that day I opened the vault, breaking the seals he had placed thereon. That same day about noon, Mr. McIsaac returned to my office in company with Mr. Heney, and these two gentlemen served me with a written statement, dictated in my office, in which Messrs. McIsaac and Heney as representatives of the Federal Trade Commission demanded access for the purpose of examination and the right to copy any documentary evidence of Swift & Co. in my possession, "particularly those certain files which are contained in wrappers under the general index 'Swift & Co.' and also certain files relating to Morris & Co., Cudahy & Co., Wilson & Co., and Armour & Co., and other corporations in the meat packing and affiliated businesses contained under the general index entitled 'General File.'"

In addition to this written demand, Messrs. McIsaac and Heney orally demanded the right to search through all of the letters and files in my office for the purpose of ascertaining what documents, if any, they as agents of the Federal Trade Commission might be entitled under the law to have access to for the purpose of examination and copy.

In answer to these written and oral demands, I wrote to Messrs. McIsaac and Heney on the same day (February 4) informing them that, under the law, they had no right to institute and carry on a general search of the files and letters in my office to see if perchance there might be among such files some documents which they would have a lawful right to examine and copy. I also informed them that none of the files referred to in their written demand was the property of Swift & Co. or any of the other corporations named in the demand, but, on the contrary, that those files were my own personal and private files and that many of the papers in such files were communications made to me as attorney by my clients, or communications from me to them in my professional capacity, and therefore privileged. Further, I informed these gentlemen that if they would indicate either verbally or in writing any particular paper in my possession which they desired to examine and copy I would at once afford them the opportunity of so doing if the document was one to which they were entitled.

Copies of the communications between Messrs. McIsaac and Heney and myself on February 4 are attached hereto, marked, respectively, Exhibits A and B.

The following day I received the reply to my letter to Mr. Heney. It was in the form of a general search warrant and was delivered by seven armed deputy marshals, Federal trade examiners and attorneys, including Mr. Heney, who invaded my office, brushed me and my assistants aside, and proceeded to search my letter files and laid violent hands upon such of my private papers as suited their fancy.

These high-handed proceedings were carried on under color of a void search warrant issuing out of the United States district court, and based upon a remarkable affidavit and deposition by the Examiner McIsaac.

In this affidavit not a single statement of fact is verified by McIsaac's oath. All he swore to was that he had good reason to believe and did verily believe so and so. He did not say that so and so are true. He did not say why he believes. He gave no facts or circumstances to which the judge who issued the warrant could apply the legal standard and decide that there was probable cause for the affiant's belief. There was nothing in the affidavit but McIsaac's application of his own undisclosed notion of the law to an undisclosed state of facts. This description of the affidavit upon which my office was raided and my private papers seized is not mine, but is the description of the affidavit given by the circuit court of appeals. The court remarks in this connection, "And under our system of Government the accuser is not permitted to be also the judge." The deposition made by McIsaac was not, so the court said, "any better than the affidavit."

While Messrs. Heney and McIsaac, and their assistants, the other examiners, and the deputy marshals were pawing through my private papers, I read the search warrant and found that it was therein charged in blanket terms that I was the custodian, or had in my office several hundred thousand different papers, none of which was described, but each and every one of which McIsaac swore had been used as the means of committing a felony. He had to swear that each and every paper had been used as the means of committing a felony for, as the circuit court of appeals says in its opinion, the statute intends that "papers and documents which afford evidence that a felony has been committed but which were not the means of committing it are immune from seizure." The papers mentioned but not described in the warrant included my check books, books of account, receipt books, etc., and every letter, opinion, and paper in my office accumulated during 25 years of practice, through which Heney et al. were privileged to search and to despoil me of at their pleasure.

My course at this moment was not exactly clear. My remedy was not apparent. True, Congress had said that, if in the process of securing a search warrant, any person swore falsely he should be liable to prosecution for perjury, but this affidavit and deposition were so cunningly drawn that there were no facts stated under oath, and so there could be no prosecution for perjury, although the affidavit and deposition were crammed with conclusions which were absolutely false. Also the law provided that I might controvert the grounds upon which the warrant was issued, but here again I was met with the condition that no grounds were stated, hence none could be controverted.

After consultation with my attorney, it was decided to apply to the district judge who had issued the warrant and to call the lack of legal grounds for issuing the warrant to his attention. Accordingly late in the afternoon of February 5 this was done and the district judge, on my application, caused the United States attorney to come into court, when a stay was ordered until the matter could be argued on the following day.

Meanwhile, and as I believe, after they were notified of my application in the district court, the Government agents hurriedly gathered together some 2,000 of my personal private papers along with a number of newspaper clippings and some other documents, quickly dumped them into a suit case, brought with them apparently for that purpose, disregarded my request for a receipt specifically describing the papers (although the statute provides that such a receipt shall be given before any papers may be taken), and carried my papers to the marshal's office, where they still remain. The following day, during the course of the argument in court, the various United States attorneys, special attorneys, etc., arose and stated that each or some of them had examined my papers before the stay order forbidding them to do so had been entered.

Subsequently the questions involved were argued before the district judge and briefs were filed, the stay order meanwhile preventing the Government agents from further inspecting or using the papers already seized, or making further search or seizure. Meantime my vault remained in the custody of the United States marshal. At this point, I may state that under this void warrant my office for weeks has been and now is policed night and day by three shifts of two men, one a Federal trade examiner, the other a deputy United States marshal. These men sit before the open door of my vault, which door the Government representatives have refused to allow to be closed although I have offered the United States attorney the privilege of putting his own combination upon the door. This has forced me to employ men to watch the other Government watchers, for with my present experience of the utter disregard of the law of the land and of the rights of the citizen by some agents of the Government, I can not feel it safe to leave my papers exposed to further prying, although they are protected by an order of the court. For the next 30 days, under the rules of the circuit court of appeals, the Government has the right to file a petition for a rehearing, etc., and so, during that time I presume I must be put to the same annoyance and expense, and all without redress or satisfaction.

The district judge declined to quash the search warrant or to return the papers already taken, whereupon I sued out a writ of error to the circuit court of appeals, with the result stated.

The writ of error to the circuit court of appeals operated, of course, as a supersedeas, and this was the text or pretext upon which the letter of Mr. Heney, now before Congress, was written. He argued that the action of the circuit judge in allowing the writ of error as a matter of course, which writ operated as a supersedeas, disclosed a defect in the law which called for additional legislation of an amendatory nature.

I invite your very careful attention to the legislation Mr. Heney recommends. When you have considered it, you will not wonder that the Federal Trade Commission tactfully avoided indorsing Mr. Heney's views when he says:

"Congress should immediately amend or supplement the act of June 15, 1917, by declaring that no writ of error or of certiorari shall lie in such a case, and that the decision of the judge who issues the search warrant shall be conclusive upon the question of the existence of probable cause, and that the summary proceedings already provided by the statute for the determination of this question, and of the question as to whether or not the property seized under the writ was used as the means for the commission of felony and is the identical property described in the writ, shall likewise be conclusive for the purpose only of enabling the court which has jurisdiction of the felony alleged to have been committed to retain such property in the custody of the law until the purpose for its seizure has been served."

This recommendation is made in connection with the seizure of my papers. Let us see what would have been the result if such a grotesque statute were already upon the books at the time of that seizure. The recommendation is in part that the decision of the judge who issued the warrant shall be conclusive upon the question of existence of probable cause. In my case the warrant was issued upon an affidavit and a deposition which are described by the three circuit judges who sat in the case and quashed the warrant in the following words:

"Applying these principles to McIsaac's affidavit, we observe that not a single statement of fact is verified by his oath. All he swears to is that 'he has good reason to believe and does verily believe' so and so. He does not swear that so and so are true. He does not say why he believes. He gives no facts or circumstances to which the judge could apply the legal standard and decide that there was probable cause for the affiant's belief. There is nothing but the affiant's application of his own undisclosed notion of the law to an undisclosed state of facts. And under our system of government the accuser is not permitted to be also the judge.

"Assuming that the 'other documents,' which are listed under reference letters and figures, are described with the particularity required by the statute, we observe that the proceeding mentioned 'books of account, minute books, letter-press copy books, ledgers, journals, cash books, day books, memorandum books, bank books, check books, and receipt books' are only generically described.

"We observe, too, that McIsaac states his belief that 'said property was used as a means of committing certain felonies,' without stating the basis of his belief that the various items were so used. If the facts were disclosed, they might or they might not afford probable cause for believing that Veeder's In Memoriam File, his lists of law books, his copies of the smoke and the wide-tire ordinances of Chicago, his office keys, etc., were the means used in committing the packers' assumed crime of controlling the price of beef.

"Further we notice that neither time nor place is laid for the unnamed acts that are supposed to constitute felonies. We take it as unquestionable that the statute contemplates the issuance of search warrants only when felonies have been committed that are presently prosecutable within the United States. We assume that no judge would issue a search warrant directing the officer to break into a museum and seize and carry away the dagger Brutus used in assassinating Cæsar. The district attorney suggests that we must take judicial notice of the fact that some of the criminal statutes which are believed to have been violated were enacted within the past three years. True; but there is nothing in the record to show that McIsaac did not believe that such statutes could be used retroactively to punish acts done generations ago.

"Turning to McIsaac's deposition, we note his statement of fact that there are in Veeder's office many papers and documents relating to Swift & Co., and that he has seen some and had a glance at others. But he utterly fails to state what he saw. He gives a mixed legal and fact opinion that the undisclosed things he saw establish that many papers and documents were used in the commission of various felonies, including conspiracy, false entries, and hoarding food. Neither with respect to the authorization of a search warrant nor the particularity with which instruments of crime must be described is the deposition any better than the affidavit."

So if the decision of the district judge upon the question of probable cause had been final in this case, I would have been despoiled of my constitutional rights and have lost my private papers, all under an absolutely void warrant, and the decision would have been irrevocable.

Turning to the operation of the proposed amendment upon a suppositious case, imagine an agent of the Comptroller of the Currency asserting in a similar affidavit and deposition that the money in the largest national banks in Chicago and New York was used as the means for the commission of various felonies such as improper speculation by bank officers in violation of the laws of the United States, or in attempted bribery of a bank examiner. Some judge, upon an affidavit and deposition in which not one fact is averred under oath, issues a warrant for the seizure of all the money in the banks, and upon a hearing he holds that probable cause has been shown and sustains the warrant. All of the assets of the bank are carted away to be held until the purpose of the seizure is accomplished, viz, the trials of the accused officers if they should ever thereafter be charged with the crimes.

If such an amendment were adopted and should stand the constitutional test, it would put it within the power of some subordinate Government official and one district judge to disrupt and paralyze the business operations of the United States, while the entire judiciary, including the Supreme Court of the United States, could only stand supinely by and impotently watch despotism oust liberty and star-chamber practice upset the traditions of our country.

Surely such a state of affairs, while it may not be "an absurdity so profound as to startle the brain of an idiot," is certainly sufficiently absurd to astound any sane man.

The search-warrant law is, in my opinion, proper and sufficient as it stands. It goes as far as the Constitution, which sets the outer mark of the invasion of the citizen's premises and effects at a reasonable search and seizure. No good citizen will complain of a law which provides that property used as the means of committing a felony or property or papers which have been used in aid of a foreign government and in violation of the laws of the United States shall be subject to search and seizure under the restriction imposed by the search-warrant act, but all fair-minded men will condemn any effort to override the law of Congress and the Constitution by Government officials who are zealous in the discharge of their duties, perhaps too zealous to regard the rights of a private citizen or to observe the method of performing their duties which has been laid down by the Constitution and by Congress.

My case here in Chicago is an instance of the latter sort. Congress has given the Federal Trade Commission broad powers of investigation. It has provided in the Trade Commission act ample means of compelling the attendance of recalcitrant witnesses and the production of any papers to which the commission or its agents are entitled. Instead of following these orderly processes of the law laid down to be followed in Federal Trade Commission investigations, a sensational raid was made without any authority of law and in utter disregard of a citizen's rights.

It is respectfully urged that the Congress, instead of amending the search-warrant act in the particulars demanded by the agents of the Federal Trade Commission, shall seek some means of impressing upon the minds of departmental subordinates the salient fact that "one's person and property must be entitled, in an orderly democracy, to protection against both mob hysteria and the oppression of agents."

Very respectfully, yours,

HENRY VEEDER.

DEMAND ON VEEDER BY HENEY AND M'ISAAC.

On behalf of the Federal Trade Commission, Mr. Hugh McIsaac and Mr. Francis J. Heney now and here demand access to, for the purpose of examination, and the right to copy any documentary evidence of Swift & Co. now in the files of you, Henry Veeder, at and in your possession at the Fort Dearborn Bank Building in the city of Chicago, Ill., or which is in your possession or under your control, and particularly those certain files which are contained in wrappers under the general index "Swift & Co.," and also certain files relating to Morris & Co., Cudahy & Co., Wilson & Co., and Armour & Co. and other corporations in the meat-packing and affiliated businesses contained under the general index entitled "General file."

This demand is made in connection with an investigation now being conducted by the Federal Trade Commission pursuant to and under the authority of that certain letter of the President of the United States, dated February 7, 1917, addressed to Hon. W. J. Harris, chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, in words as follows:

"Pursuant to the authority conferred upon me by the act creating the Federal Trade Commission, therefore I direct the commission within the scope of its powers to investigate and report the facts relating to the production, ownership, manufacture, storage, and distribution of foodstuffs and products or by-products arising from or in connection with their preparation and manufacture; to ascertain the facts bearing on alleged violations of the antitrust acts, and particularly upon the question whether there are manipulations, controls, trusts, combinations, conspiracies, or restraints of trade out of harmony with the law or the public interests.

"I am aware that the commission has additional authority in this field through the power conferred upon it to prevent certain persons, partnerships, or corporations from using unfair methods of competition or commerce.

"I presume that you may see fit to exercise that authority upon your own initiative, without direction from me, and also pursuant to the provisions of sections 9 and 10 of the Federal Trade Commission act."

VEEDER'S REPLY.

FEBRUARY 4, 1918.

Mr. FRANCIS J. HENEY,
Mr. HUGH MCISAAC,
Chicago.

DEAR SIRS: Referring to written demand which you dictated in my office about noon to-day, you are hereby informed that you or any other agent of the Federal Trade Commission, may have access at all reasonable times, for the purpose of examination, and the right to copy any documentary evidence belonging to any of the corporations mentioned in your said demand which may be in my possession or within my control.

You also verbally requested permission to search through all the files in my office to ascertain and determine what documents, if any, you, as agents of the Federal Trade Commission, are entitled, under the law, to have access to for the purpose of examination and copying.

In reply to such verbal demand, I desire to inform you that it is my contention that under the law you have no right to institute and carry on a general search of the files in my office for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not there may be among such files some documents which you might desire to examine and copy. If, however, you will indicate, either verbally or in writing, any particular document or documents which you desire to examine and copy and if the required document is in my possession and is one which under the law you are entitled to examine and copy, you will at once be accorded access to the same.

In your written demand of this day, you request the opportunity to examine and copy—

"certain files which are contained in wrappers under the general index 'Swift and Company' and also certain files relating to Morris and Company, Cudahy and Company, Wilson and Company, and Armour and Company, and other corporations in the meat packing and affiliated businesses contained under the general index 'General File.'"

Permit me to inform you that I have no files indexed under the title "Swift and Company" and "General File." I have, however, certain files which are indexed under the titles "Swift Letter File" and "General Letter File," and it is to these I assume you refer in your written demand. Since the receipt of your demand, I have made a cursory examination of the files indexed under the last-named titles. The number of subject matters discussed in the documents contained in the files in question number approximately 1,000, while the documents embraced therein probably exceed in number 12,000. None of these files is the property of Swift and Company or any of the other corporations named in your written demand. They are my personal files and communications made to me by my clients or by me to them in my professional capacity and are, therefore, privileged. You have already recognized the fact that I have in my possession files and documents which are not the property of any of the corporations mentioned in your demand, but which belong to me personally. You have also recognized the fact that I have in my possession documents which are privileged under the law and which I may not be compelled to produce.

If you will indicate any particular document, paper, or letter which you may desire to examine and copy, I will institute immediate search for such document, letter, or paper, and if it appears that the document is one which you are entitled to examine and copy, I will at once afford you an opportunity to do so.

HENRY VEEDER.

[Copy of opinion of circuit court of appeals, seventh circuit.]

In the United States circuit court of appeals for the seventh circuit. No. 2591. October term, 1917, January session, 1918. Henry Veeder, plaintiff in error, v. United States of America, defendant in error. Error to the district court of the United States for the northern district of Illinois, eastern division.

Before Baker, Kohlsaat, and Evans, circuit judges.

Baker, circuit judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This writ of error challenges the sufficiency of the affidavit and deposition on which a search warrant was issued under Title XI of the act of June 15, 1917.

By the fourth amendment to the Constitution the people declared the limit beyond which Congress may not go in authorizing search warrants, namely:

"The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched and the persons or things to be seized."

This limitation was clearly observed in the act in question.

Section 2 defines the property and papers that may be seized as follows:

"(1) When the property was stolen or embezzled in violation of a law of the United States.

"(2) When the property was used as the means of committing a felony, in which case it may be taken on a warrant from any house or other place in which it is concealed, or from the possession of the person by whom it was used in the commission of the offense, or from any person in whose possession it may be.

"(3) When the property or any paper is possessed, controlled, or used in violation of section 22 of this title."

Section 22, so referred to, reads thus:

"Whoever, in aid of any foreign government, shall knowingly and willfully have possession of or control over any property or papers designed or intended for use or which is used as the means of violating any penal statute, or any of the rights or obligations of the United States under any treaty or the law of nations, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than two years, or both."

Sections 3 and 5 prescribe the character of application that must be made for the search warrant:

"SEC. 3. A search warrant can not be issued but upon probable cause, supported by affidavit, naming or describing the person and particularly describing the property and the place to be searched."

"SEC. 5. The affidavits or depositions must set forth the facts tending to establish the grounds of the application or probable cause for believing that they exist."

McIsaac, an examiner in the service of the Federal Trade Commission, made an affidavit "that he has good reason to believe, and does verily believe, that in and upon certain premises within said district and division, to wit, in suite 1200 in the building at 76 West Monroe Street, in the city of Chicago, known as the Fort Dearborn Bank Building, said suite being the offices occupied by one Henry Veeder, there has been and now is located and concealed certain property, to wit, books of account, minute books, letter-press copy books, ledgers, journals, cash books, day books, memorandum books, bank books, check books, receipt books, and other documents, which other documents are more particularly enumerated, described, and indexed by words, letters, and figures as follows, to wit:" (then follows a list of references to letter files and document files, comprising about 2,000 items) "which said property has been used as a means of committing certain felonies; that is to say, the felony on the part of Swift & Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Illinois, of storing, acquiring, and holding for the purpose of limiting the supply thereof to the public, and affecting the market price thereof in commerce, among the several States, of certain articles suitable for human food, to wit, meats, canned vegetables, canned fruit, canned fish, poultry, cheese, butter, eggs, and oleomargarine; the felony on the part of said corporation of willfully making false entries and statements of fact in certain reports pertaining to the ownership and control of subsidiary corporations by said corporation, which the Federal Trade Commission required it to make under subdivision (B) of section 6 of the act approved September 26, 1914, entitled 'An act to create a Federal Trade Commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes'; the felony on the part of said corporation of willfully making false entries in divers accounts, records, and memoranda kept by said corporation of all facts and transactions appertaining to the business of said corporation, it being a corporation subject to said act of Congress; the felony on the part of said corporation of willfully neglecting and failing to make or causing to be made full, true, and correct entries in said accounts, records, and memoranda of all facts and transactions appertaining to the business of said corporation; and the felony of engaging in a conspiracy with Armour & Co., Morris & Co., Wilson & Co. (Inc.), Cudahy & Co., and with divers other corporations and divers individuals and partnerships to defraud the United States through and by means of collusive bidding upon contracts to be let to the lowest bidder to furnish to the United States large quantities of meats, hides, leather, canned goods, and other commodities for the use of the military and naval forces of the United States."

As illustrative of the wide scope of the list included in the affidavit and covered by the search warrant the following items are noted:

McIsaac's deposition is as follows:

"Q. State, if you know, whether there are certain papers and documents there in the office of Mr. Veeder relating to Swift & Co.

"A. Yes, sir; there are.

"Q. Just state, if you will, what those papers and documents are.

"A. There are a large number of papers.

"Q. Also state the occasion of your going and seeing them there.

"A. I made a partial examination of the papers of Henry Veeder, and he has a large quantity of files among the papers showing that they have been used in the commission of various felonies, one of them being in connection with the alteration of the books of Swift & Co. and other companies—some of them concerning violations of law that would make them guilty at this time of hoarding not only beef but of storing food products with the ultimate purpose of enhancing the prices thereof.

"Q. What food?

"A. Canned goods, canned fish, poultry, cheese, butter, eggs, all kinds of canned vegetables, and other foods. There are also papers there which show the false entry of various false entries made in books, account books, and papers required under the Federal Trade Commission act.

"Q. Books of whom?

"A. Books of Swift & Co. in the possession of Henry Veeder.

"Q. What else?

"A. There are other records which have been used in the furtherance of a conspiracy between Swift & Co., Armour & Co., Morris & Co., Cudahy & Co., and Wilson & Co. for the purpose of defrauding the United States Government in bidding upon contracts for the supply of hides, foods, leather, etc., for the Government.

"Q. What else did you see there?

"Judge LANDIS. You say you have seen these papers?

"A. I have seen some and have had a glance at others, which I was not permitted to inspect in detail, and apparently there are a great number of files there which relate to all these matters."

A brief statement of the applicable principles of law will suffice, for they are so well settled, so obvious from a reading of the constitutional and statutory provisions in question, so founded in the instinctive sense of natural justice, that no elaboration of the ground therefor is needed.

One's person and property must be entitled, in an orderly democracy, to protection against both mob hysteria and the oppression of agents whom the people have chosen to represent them in the administration of laws which are required by the Constitution to operate upon all persons alike.

One's home and place of business are not to be invaded forcibly and searched by the curious and suspicious. Not even by a disinterested officer of the law, unless he is armed with a search warrant.

No search warrant shall be issued unless the judge has first been furnished with facts under oath, not suspicions, beliefs, or surmises, but facts which, when the law is properly applied to them, tend to establish the necessary legal conclusion or facts which, when the law is properly applied to them, tend to establish probable cause for believing that the legal conclusion is right. The inviolability of the accused's home is to be determined by the facts, not by rumor, suspicion, or guesswork. If the facts afford the legal basis for the search warrant, the accused must take the consequences. But equally there must be consequences for the accuser to face. If the sworn accusation is based on fiction, the accuser must take the chance of punishment for perjury. Hence the necessity of a sworn statement of facts, because one can not be convicted of perjury for having a belief, though the belief be utterly unfounded in fact and law.

The finding of the legal conclusion or of probable cause from the exhibited facts is a judicial function, and it can not be delegated by the judge to the accuser.

No search warrant should be broader than the justifying basis of facts. For example, if a murder has been committed by means of a shot from a gun and by no other means, the search warrant should not direct the officer to enter the accused's home and seize the family register of births and deaths. And as the serving officer has no discretion in executing the search warrant in its entirety, the householder is entitled to have the search warrant quashed.

It is not every kind of property that may be seized under a search warrant. Limited by McIsaac's accusation, the statute applies only to property that "was used as the means of committing a felony." By exclusion, therefore, papers and documents which afford evidence that a felony has been committed, but which were not the means of committing it, are immune from seizure.

Applying these principles to McIsaac's affidavit, we observe that not a single statement of fact is verified by his oath. All he swears to is that "he has good reason to believe and does verily believe" so and so. He does not swear that so and so are true. He does not say why he believes. He gives no facts or circumstances to which the judge could apply the legal standard and decide that there was probable cause for the affiant's belief. There is nothing but the affiant's application of his own undisclosed notion of the law to an undisclosed state of facts. And under our system of government the accuser is not permitted to be also the judge.

Assuming that the "other documents," which are listed under reference letters and figures, are described with the particularity required by the statute, we observe that the precedingly mentioned "books of account, minute books, letterpress copy books, ledgers, journals, cash books, day books, memorandum books, bank books, check books, and receipt books" are only generically described.

We observe, too, that McIsaac states his belief that "said property was used as a means of committing certain felonies," without stating the basis of his belief that the various items were so used. If the facts were disclosed, they might or they might not afford probable cause for believing that Veeder's In Memoriam File, his lists of law books, his copies of the smoke and the wide-tire ordinances of Chicago, his office keys, etc., were the means used in committing the packers' assumed crime of controlling the price of beef.

Further, we notice that neither time nor place is laid for the unnamed acts that are supposed to constitute felonies. We take it as unquestionable that the statute contemplates the issuance of search warrants only when felonies have been committed that are presently prosecutable within the United States. We assume that no judge would issue a search warrant directing the officer to break into a museum and seize and carry away the dagger Brutus used in assassinating Caesar. The district attorney suggests that we must take judicial notice of the fact that some of the criminal statutes which are believed to have been violated were enacted within the past three years. True; but there is nothing in the record to show that McIsaac did not believe that such statutes could be used retroactively to punish acts done generations ago.

Turning to McIsaac's deposition, we note his statement of fact that there are in Veeder's office many papers and documents relating to Swift & Co., and that he has seen some and had a glance at others. But he utterly fails to state what he saw. He gives a mixed legal and fact opinion that the undisclosed things he saw establish that many papers and documents were used in the commission of various felonies, including conspiracy, false entries, and hoarding food. Neither with respect to the authorization of a search warrant nor the particularity with which instruments of crime must be described is the depostion any better than the affidavit.

We thoroughly agree with the learned district judge that the shield of the Constitution does not protect property that has been used in the commission of a felony, and that such outlaw property is subject to seizure by search warrant under this statute. But we find that the Constitution and this statute forbid a search warrant unless the issuing magistrate shall first properly draw the necessary legal conclusion from facts duly presented to him under the oath of the accuser. And in the record now before us we find no such presentation of facts.

Needless to say, the present judgment is not a bar to further proceedings.

Reversed, with direction to quash the search warrant.

A true copy.

REPLY OF SWIFT & CO. TO QUESTIONS SUBMITTED JULY 23, 1917, BY THE FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

SWIFT & CO.,
UNION STOCK YARDS,
Chicago, August 25, 1917.

Hon. JOSEPH E. DAVIES,
Federal Trade Commission, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your letter of July 23, in which you ask us questions about the live stock and meat situation, we have prepared the attached statement.

We have dealt with the subject at some length in our desire to cover it fully and trust that the commission will find the information of value.

Yours, respectfully,

SWIFT & CO.,
L. F. SWIFT,
President.

Question 1. "As you are aware, there is widespread complaint among consumers as to the prices of meats and other animal food products. The commission would like your views as to the cause of present high prices, to what extent they are justified, and if in your judgment there is not complete justification for them, what factor or factors in the production and distribution of meat animals and their products can be justly criticized?"

Our reply to this question is as follows:

PRICES OF ALL COMMODITIES HAVE RISEN.

The recent increase in meat prices has been part of an upward movement of prices in general. As compared with other commodities, it does not appear that meat prices have risen abnormally; nor, in fact, as much as many other important food products. Preliminary figures obtained from the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics show the following percentage increases in wholesale prices for June, 1917, over the prices for July, 1916, for meats and various other products:

Increases in wholesale prices, June, 1917, over July, 1916.

	Per cent increase.
Cattle, good to choice steers	25.6
Beef, fresh, native steers	15.0
Hogs, heavy	59.8
Bacon, short clear sides	54.1
Lard, prime, contract	61.8
Wheat, No. 1 northern	130.3
Flour, standard patent	127.8
Corn, No. 2 mixed	112.4
Potatoes, white	241.8
Cotton, upland middling	96.2
Wool, fine fleece, scoured	77.1
Coal, bituminous	172.7
Copper, electrolytic	22.6
Pig lead	66.6
Pig tin	61.9
Pig iron, Bessemer	149.2
Petroleum, crude	19.2

The same thing is true with regard to retail prices, as shown by the following figures, also from the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics (Monthly Review of the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics, July, 1917, p. 131), which indicate the percentage increases in prices for May 15, 1917, as compared with the average prices for the whole year 1916:

Increases in retail prices, May 15, 1917, over average for 1916.

	Per cent increase.
Sirloin steak	18
Round steak	21
Rib roast	21
Chuck roast	27
Pork chops	35
Bacon	45
Ham	32
Lamb	59
Hens	24
Eggs, strictly fresh	6
Butter	18
Cheese	31
Bread	30
Flour	98
Corn meal	58
Potatoes	127
Onions	76
Beans, navy	74
Sugar	25

The average increase in retail prices for May 15, 1917, over the year 1916 for all foodstuffs reported by the Bureau of Labor Statistics was 33 per cent; the average increase for fresh beef cuts, pork chops, bacon, and ham was only 28.6 per cent.

These figures prove that the prices of dressed meats, especially beef, have not risen as much as the prices of other foods, and that the prices of such staple products as cotton, wool, coal, and pig iron have risen much more than foods in general. The preceding statement of wholesale prices also shows that the prices of dressed meats have not increased as much as the prices of live animals—a point which will be discussed below. It would appear reasonable to ask not only why have meat prices risen as much as they have but why have they not risen as much as the prices of other commodities? This question we shall attempt to answer.

REASONS FOR HIGH PRICES.

The fundamental reasons for the recent abnormal increase in the general price level are to be found, first, in an enlarged money supply; second, in an unprecedented demand due to foreign buying and domestic war-time prosperity; and, third, in an actual shortage of many important commodities.

The first two of these reasons—the large money supply and the unprecedented demand—account for the increase in meat prices, but an unusually large supply in the case of meat has operated to keep prices from going so high as they otherwise would, or so high as the prices of other agricultural products have gone.

THE UNUSUAL DEMAND FOR MEAT PRODUCTS.

The unprecedented demand for meat products has been due, as stated above, to prosperity at home and to foreign buying. As for the excessive domestic demand this is caused by general industrial prosperity, high wages, and steady employment. The purchasing power of the American public was never so great as it is now. Many people who ordinarily use meat sparingly have been earning so much more money in industries boomed by the war that they are buying meat more plentifully now than ever before, in spite of the higher prices, thereby more than offsetting the reduced consumption among salaried people who have not benefited from war conditions. Furthermore, the facts that more people are at work than ever before and that there have been no periods of unemployment during the past two years have also contributed to the tremendous demand. In our opinion the unprecedented demand is the principal reason for the increase in meat prices.

This domestic demand has been accompanied by a large foreign demand. The exports of meat in 1916 showed a great increase over the figures for the year preceding the European war. For example, exports of beef and beef products increased from 148,000,000 pounds in 1914 (year ending June 30) to 444,000,000 pounds in 1916; fresh pork increased from less than 3,000,000 pounds to 63,000,000 pounds; and cured pork products from 405,000,000 pounds to 925,000,000 pounds.

Except in the case of pork products, the exports for 1917 do not show any very large increases over 1916. The following figures represent quantities exported during the 10 months ending April 30, 1916 and 1917:

Exports for 10 months ending April 30.

	1916	1917
	Pounds.	Pounds.
Fresh beef	176,700,000	152,300,000
Canned beef	34,600,000	47,300,000
Pickled and other cured beef	33,600,000	49,300,000
Bacon	483,400,000	555,900,000
Hams and shoulders	232,700,000	222,000,000
Lard	332,400,000	389,900,000
Total	1,293,400,000	1,416,700,000

For the aggregate beef and pork products enumerated in this table the exports for the 10 months ending April 30, 1917, were about 10 per cent greater than for the corresponding period in 1915–16. This is enough of an increase to account partly for the advance in domestic prices.

The great foreign demand for cured pork partly accounts for the fact that prices of pork products have increased more than the prices of beef. One reason for the great foreign demand for our meats has been the shortage of ocean carriers, which has forced England and France to buy in the United States what they would otherwise have bought in more distant countries.

THE MEAT SUPPLY.

The reason that meat and live-stock prices have not advanced as much as the prices of other commodities is that the supply of meat animals has appreciably increased. The quantity of live stock marketed and slaughtered in 1916 was the largest in the history of the country: and the significant thing is, to quote from the annual report of the Secretary of Agriculture for 1916, "this heavier slaughtering has been accompanied by an increase in the remaining stock of animals."

It is, of course, only natural that as the western ranges have been broken up, as the cost of live-stock raising has increased, and as the area available for live-stock production has not increased in proportion to the growth of population, the production of live stock per capita should have shown a tendency to fall off during the past 20 or 30 years. The estimates of the United States Department of Agriculture and the census figures, on which have been based so many statements to prove that per capita production of live stock has fallen off seriously, are of at least questionable accuracy. The changing of the census date from June 1 to April 15 in 1910 further complicated the situation, and rendered comparisons for years before and after that date of doubtful validity, because the new date of April 15, to which recent figures apply, excludes a large proportion of the calf, lamb, and pig crops that was previously included.

Data concerning live-stock and meat production are estimates at best, but we believe that the figures of meat production shown in the accompanying table come as near the facts as it is possible to get. In constructing this table we have used the exact number of animals slaughtered in the United States inspected houses, and have expanded these into total number of pounds of meat produced by using the same method as that used in report 109 of the United States Department of Agriculture, "The Meat Situation in the United States, part 1," page 263. The percentages and weights used in constructing it are shown in an explanatory note at the end of the table:

EXPLANATORY NOTE.—The basis of this table is the number of head slaughtered in inspected houses. From this is estimated the total number slaughtered by applying the percentage of total slaughtered in inspected houses in 1909, as shown below. The number of pounds is found by multiplying the number of head by average dressed weights of carcasses, also shown below. "Other edible portions" include such things as hearts, livers, edible fats, etc., the number of pounds of which per head is also shown in following statement:

	Per cent of total in inspected houses.	Average weight dressed.	Other edible portions per animal.
		Pounds.	Pounds.
Cattle	56.39	543	98
Calves	35.46	105	9.7
Sheep	76.95	41	2
Hogs	58.86	154	25

Using the figures of total meat production in this table and the census figures of population, the per capita production of meats for each year from 1909 to 1916 was as follows:

	Pounds.
1909	217.2
1910	197.7
1911	219.1
1912	208.2
1913	206.5
1914	191.9

It will be seen from these figures that the per capita production of meats has not only held its own since 1909 but that in 1916 it was much larger than in any year shown. And the most significant fact of all is that, although the per capita production of meats was so large in 1916, the actual number of live animals on farms on January 1, 1917, also showed an appreciable increase.

These facts concerning meat production not only prove our statement that increased production accounts for the fact that prices of meats have not advanced as much as prices of commodities in general but they appear to disprove the general belief that there is a serious shortage of live stock and the charge that production has been discouraged by low prices.

The fact that the prices of dressed meats have not advanced as rapidly as the prices of live animals deserves further emphasis. The following actual figures taken from the records of Swift & Co. for corresponding weeks of 1916 and 1917 show the facts for beef and live cattle. The selection of any other weeks during the last few months would yield similar results.

	Week ended July 1.			Week ended July 8.
	1916	1917	Per cent increase.	1916	1917	Per cent increase.
Live cattle	$8.24	$10.00	21.3	$8.08	$10.00	23.7
Dressed beef	12.90	14.72	14.1	12.87	14.80	15.0

From this table it will be seen that whereas the prices paid for live cattle increased 21.3 and 23.7 per cent, respectively, for the two weeks under review the prices received for dressed beef increased only 14.1 and 15 per cent, respectively. In other words, the prices received for live stock by growers have increased faster than the prices we have received for meats. The fact that Swift & Co.'s gross margin on beef to cover expenses and profits has been a smaller percentage of selling price in 1917 than in 1916 has been made possible by the high prices prevailing for hides and other by-products.

As bearing on this same significant fact, the accompanying diagram 1 has been prepared based on figures from Swift & Co.'s books showing the relation between the price paid for live cattle, the price of dressed beef, the value of by-products, and the net profit per hundred pounds of dressed beef weekly for the year ending June 30, 1917. Since cattle bought at any one time are sold as dressed meat a week or so later the sale price of dressed beef as shown in the diagram is for one week later than the price paid for cattle. This makes the comparison approximately accurate.

Several important facts are revealed by this diagram. First, it will be seen that in general the prices of beef and cattle fluctuate together; second, the actual margin between sale price of beef and cost of live cattle widens out somewhat as prices rise, due to the fact that beef yield is only a little over 50 per cent of the live weight, so that the price of beef has to increase or decrease faster than the price of cattle. As the actual spread widens, however, it becomes a smaller proportion of the selling price.

Finally, and most significant, the diagram shows that the net profit remains within narrow limits, whatever the prices of beef and live stock, and that for many weeks during the recent era of high prices actual losses have been suffered by the beef branch of Swift & Co.'s business. There could be no better evidence of an absence of control over prices of beef and cattle.

CONCLUSIONS WITH REGARD TO PRICES.

From the foregoing discussion of prices in answer to question 1 the following facts have been established:

1. The increase in meat prices has been part of a general movement toward higher price levels due to economic causes that are not peculiar to the packing industry.

2. Meat prices have not advanced as much as the prices of foodstuffs in general, nor as much as the prices of other important articles of commerce.

3. Meat prices have not advanced as much as the prices of live stock.

4. A record quantity of live stock marketed accounts for the fact that meat prices have not advanced as much as the prices of other commodities.

5. These greater marketings of live stock have not been accompanied by a diminution of the number of animals on farms, as is popularly believed, but rather by a definite increase of the live-stock supply. In other words, live-stock production has not been discouraged.

6. There is nothing about recent price tendencies which indicates or suggests that there have been any unnatural or artificial causes at work with regard to meat prices.

7. The only way to promptly reduce prices appreciably under present conditions would be to induce or to compel consumers (at home and abroad) to use less meat; but this would react on the farmer by reducing the price of live animals, and this in turn would curtail production.

Question 2. Since question 2 asks how the present agencies in production and distribution fail to perform their economic functions in serving the ultimate consumer this question will be answered under question 4, which asks for economic weaknesses in the present system and the remedies therefor.

Question 3. "In your opinion is the present vast system of conducting the meat business from the raising of the animals on the range and farm through all the steps to the table of the consumers the result of the operation of healthy, natural laws or is it in part the result of efforts, either conscious or unconscious, to interfere with the operation of such laws?"

Our reply to this question is as follows:

We believe the present system of marketing live stock from the ranch or farm to the consumer's table is the result of "healthy, natural laws," and that it has not been the result of efforts "to interfere with the operation of such laws." We further believe this fact is susceptible of conclusive proof to the impartial student. The reasons that we advance for this belief, which will be enlarged on below, are as follows:

1. Each middleman or manufacturer now engaged in the marketing of live animals and meats performs necessary and useful functions.

2. The development of large packing companies is the natural result of the economies of large-scale production and distribution.

3. The packers buy animals and sell meats in open competitive markets.

1. SERVICES PERFORMED BY THE VARIOUS MIDDLEMEN.

The channels of trade through which live stock generally passes from producer to consumer are as follows: At country points growers either ship direct or sell to a "shipper" or "cattle buyer," or in some cases ship through a cooperative association. When a grower raises enough live stock to ship in car lots there is little or no need of a middleman at country points. On the other hand, when farmers raise animals on such a small scale as to have only a few head to market at one time it becomes practically necessary for some agency to gather the offerings of individual farmers for car-lot shipments. In some cases this service is performed by the farmers cooperatively through their own shipping associations.

On leaving country points live stock is shipped to commission merchants in the large central markets. These commission merchants look after the interests of shippers and attend to the handling and feeding of stock in the yards. They are expert judges of live-stock values, know the needs and peculiarities of the various buyers, and obtain the highest possible price for their consignments.

Although "dealers" and "shippers" handle part of the receipts in all large stockyards and have an important and beneficial influence on prices, the next important step is the packing house, which not only performs the necessary functions of slaughtering and dressing but ordinarily markets through an extensive selling organization to retailers all over the country. The retailer is the final step in the marketing process, and his services are just as necessary as those of the various other agencies described above. In fact, there seems to be sufficient economic justification for the general organization of the marketing process.

2. REASONS FOR THE DEVELOPMENT OF LARGE PACKING HOUSES.

This brings us to the organization of the packing business itself and the fact that there has been a development of large companies. This has happened, as in other industries, though to no greater extent than in many, because of fundamental economic advantages which accompany large-scale production. These advantages are as follows: Minute division of labor and specialization in the manufacturing department of the business; utilization of by-products; efficient marketing organization and methods; as a result of these three advantages, a surprisingly low cost of production and distribution; and, finally, the production of the highest possible quality of meats and the standardization of grades.

Division of labor and specialization: The packing industry offers one of the best examples of economies resulting from minute subdivision of the manufacturing process among specialized workmen. Because business is done on such a large scale it is possible to let each employee specialize on some single process, thereby bringing about the highest possible degree of accuracy, skill, and speed.

Utilization of by-products: The packing industry is the classic example of economies effected through the utilization of by-products, and this point does not need to be enlarged on.

Efficient marketing organization and methods: One of the most important features of the present organization of the packing business is the fact that meats are distributed direct to retailers in the larger cities and towns of the country through the branch houses of the packers. Branch-house distribution is supplemented by the "car routes," which reach towns that are not large enough to support branch houses. This extensive marketing organization results in the most scientific and skillful handling of the perishable products sold and makes them available to all parts of the country. Since different cities demand different qualities of meat, this organization makes possible the shipment of just the quality demanded; since the quantity demanded by different sections fluctuates from week to week, meats can be sent to markets where demand is the greatest and kept away from those markets where demand is slack. Only a country-wide organization can do this with the greatest efficiency. Furthermore, a well-organized export department takes care of the foreign business.

The efficiency of marketing is also enhanced by the fact that each of the large companies has a number of packing houses distributed throughout the producing sections, enabling the most efficient and economical assembling of the different qualities of animals from various parts of the country and the shipment of meats from the nearest plant in each case. The efficiency due to size applies not only to the marketing of meats, but to the manufacturing and marketing of by-products as well.

Low cost of slaughtering and marketing: As a result of these advantages of large-scale production, the expenses of slaughtering, dressing, and marketing have been reduced to a minimum, and the packer takes out an astonishingly small margin between producer and consumer. One of the most striking facts that illustrate this point is that the price paid to the stockman by the packer for cattle is about 90 per cent of the price actually realized by him in the sale of beef and by-products.

In a recent bulletin on the Meat Situation in the United States, issued by the United States Department of Agriculture, figures are presented showing the marketing costs on nine lots of cattle from country shipping points through the retailer to the consumer. Interpreting these figures, the bulletin says (Report No. 113, p. 71): "The distribution of returns indicated by the data is approximately two-thirds to three-quarters to the stockman, 3 to 4 per cent shipping and stockyards' expense, 5 to 6 per cent packing and wholesale distribution, and 15 to 20 per cent retailing." These percentages are based on final retail prices. It must be borne in mind that the packer has to pay his expenses of buying, maintenance and operation of slaughtering plants, transportation, and selling through branch houses out of this 5 or 6 per cent as well as make his net profit.

These figures prove conclusively that the packer performs his services at low cost, and that he receives a surprisingly small part of the total spread between the price of live cattle and the price paid for meat by consumers; the inspection of the Swift & Co. accounts by the auditors of the Federal Trade Commission will reveal these facts even more convincingly.

Improvement and standardization of meat quality: Possibly the greatest advantage of all is the improvement and standardization of the quality of meat sold, as well as the condition in which it is delivered to retailers. In the first place, the scientific methods used by the packers yield the very highest quality and condition of meats from the animals available for slaughter, and this is one of the greatest contributions of the large-scale packing industry. Furthermore, the qualities and grades are standardized, and the large packers are able to supply a definite standard of quality month in and month out to any individual dealer who has a definite and established trade. The qualities of meat demanded by different sections of the country, and even by different cities in the same section, vary; and the packer, with his large supply and assortment, can adjust his shipments to suit these various demands. In other words, the large packer makes possible the production of the highest possible quality of meats, their availability in perfect condition, the standardization of grades, and, in general, the most efficient utilization of the meat supply.

PROFITS.

From the gross margin, as explained above, the packer must not only pay his expenses but he must also obtain his net profit. Swift & Co.'s average net profit over a series of years has been less than 3 cents per dollar of sales.

Profits on cattle and sheep: For the five years ending with September 30, 1916, Swift & Co. in all of its plants together made a profit of $1.22 per head of cattle before paying interest on borrowed money. The net profit by years was as follows:

Profit on cattle,	Per head.
1912	$0.707
1913	.776
1914	1.171
1915	1.643

This profit amounts to about one-eighth of a cent a pound live weight, or one-quarter of a cent a pound dressed weight, including returns from all the by-products.

It has been commonly said that the prices prevailing for fat cattle in the year 1915 were unprofitable to the producer. It has also been intimated that the general business situation justified much higher beef and cattle prices and that, as a matter of fact, the packers had, by reason of low cattle prices, made exorbitant profits on cattle in 1915. Our profits on cattle during 1915 were $1.64 per head, approximately one-eighth of a cent per pound live weight, or one-quarter of a cent per pound dressed weight of beef, including all of the by-products. Our profits during that year were seldom as high as one-half cent per pound of beef. This was also true in 1916.

In arriving at the profit for the five years we have taken into account the actual amount of money which the retail dealer paid us for the sale of the dressed beef; and the sale of livers, hearts, tails, etc.; the sale of casings, oleo oil and stearine, tallow, blood and tankage, bones, hoofs, horns, and, in fact, all of the by-products produced. We have taken into account the actual sale of the hides, the major portion of which is sold to tanneries in which we are not interested. The hides which we have sold to our own tanneries have been charged to them at the full market price current on the day of sale.

From these sales we have deducted the actual cost of the live cattle and actual expenses and freight incurred. All expenses deducted represent actual money out of pocket, except depreciation, which has averaged less than 2½ per cent on buildings and 8 per cent on machinery.

Even if Swift & Co. should waive all beef profit and give it to stock raisers, they, the stock raisers, would receive less than $1.50 a head more than they now realize; if it should be given to consumers in the form of lower meat prices, it would reduce the cost to the average individual less than 25 cents per year for all the beef that he eats. As a matter of fact, if the packer should give up his net profit on slaughtering and meat packing, the effect on both live-stock prices and retail meat prices would be inappreciable; it would be practically nil. If these facts could be generally realized, they would dispel the popular illusion that the packers manipulate prices so as to make extortionate profits.

On sheep and lambs, Swift & Co.'s average profit for the five years ending September 30, 1916, was only 14.9 cents per head, including the sale of all by-products. The profit by years was as follows:

Profit on sheep.	Per head.
1912	$0.156
1913	.126
1914	.115
1916	.200

Hog profits: In considering hog profits it should be realized that hog packing differs from cattle and sheep slaughtering in important respects. There are larger elements of uncertainty in the hog industry; whereas the dressed meat of cattle and sheep is sold almost immediately after slaughter, the greater portion of the hog goes through various processes of curing and preparation, which means that such products made from hogs bought to-day will not be sold for several months. The probable future value of these hog products is therefore much more speculative than the products of cattle, sheep, and lambs, which are sold before the market has had time to change to any great extent, and the value of the live hog is therefore influenced largely by the trader's estimate of future conditions. It should also be noted that hog values depend more on world conditions and influences, whereas values of cattle and sheep depend more on domestic supply and demand.

For the five years ending September 30, 1916, Swift & Co.s average net profit on hogs was 58.5 cents per head. The profits by years have been as follows:

Profit on hogs.	Per head.
1912	$0.503
1913	.603
1914	.567

No interest on borrowed money has been deducted in obtaining these results; and such interest charge is greater for hogs than for cattle and sheep. The speculative nature of the results is indicated by the wide fluctuation in profits from year to year from a minimum of 18.6 cents a head in 1915 to a maximum of 97.4 cents in 1916. The figures do not include profits on refined lard. Even if they were to be included—and the refining of lard is an entirely separate business—the net profit per hog would be raised to only 66.5 cents instead of 58.5 cents as shown above.

It will be found by the accountants of the Federal Trade Commission, who are working on our books at the time this is written, and who can verify the figures shown above, that the profits for the nine months ending June 30, 1917, have been running larger than during recent years. But even during this period the net profit on all cattle, sheep, and hogs slaughtered has been less than 1 cent a pound, dressed weight. It is impossible to obtain final figures for 1917, especially on hogs, until later in the year. Our stocks of cured meats reach their maximum in July and actual profits can not be computed until they have been sold late in the fall.

The principal reason for higher profits during recent months is that values have been advancing so rapidly and steadily that between the time of slaughter of animals and the time of sale of the resulting meats the enhancement of values has been much greater than we could anticipate. When the tide turns and values begin to recede the effect on our profits will be just the opposite, i. e., they will be reduced or turned into losses. For this reason we do not consider such additional profits as available for distribution among shareholders, but expect to conserve them in the nature of a reserve to take care of possible losses in the future.

In connection with the profit figures shown above, some one may say that though the profit per head is small the profit in the aggregate is large. It is, of course, only because of the immense volume that the packer can afford to do business on the slender margin that ordinarily prevails and still earn a fair return on capital invested. It is safe to say that the profits on capital invested earned by the large packers are no more than reasonable. If some earn more than others, this is the reward of greater efficiency. It is also a significant fact that the earnings of the packers, even during recent months, have been small as compared with the profits reaped in other lines of business during war times.

If those who are so suspicious of the big packers could only visualize the position the packers occupy—the fact that after having developed the best buying methods possible, the most efficient manufacturing methods, and the most effective sales organization, they are able to realize over long periods only a fraction of a cent net profit per pound, and that it requires a continuous and aggressive policy of maintained and improved efficiency to save this slender margin of profit after all expenses are paid, then those who are fair-minded could not help but change their views—they would come to the realization that the big packing industry is something for the country to be proud of and that its operations are a benefit to both stock raisers and meat dealers in that under no other system could the margin between cattle prices and meat prices be as small as it is.

3. THE PACKER BUYS ANIMALS AND SELLS MEATS IN OPEN COMPETITIVE MARKETS.

It has already been shown in reply to question 1 that the prices of beef and live cattle fluctuate together and that the net profit to the packer, although it varies from week to week, averages less than a half a cent a pound and bears no relation to the prices of dressed beef and live cattle. This in itself constitutes a proof that prices are not manipulated so as to yield extortionate profits to the packers; but there are numerous other features of the live-stock and meat trades which would render it extremely difficult, if not absolutely impossible, for any set of operators to control prices even if they should attempt to do so. Some of these features are discussed below.

The demand for fresh meat, which is perishable, fluctuates greatly. Live stock is worth to the packer only as much as it can be sold for after it has been converted into dressed meat and by-products. Although Chicago live-stock prices are looked on as basic, it is little realized how much they, in turn, depend on the prices of dressed meats in large consuming centers, such as New York, Boston, and Philadelphia; and the demand in these large consuming centers fluctuates from day to day, with consequent rapid variations in price, over which the packer has no control.

Approximately 90 per cent of the fresh beef marketed is simply refrigerated, rather than frozen, and is therefore extremely perishable. It must be sold within about two weeks from the time of slaughter. This complicates the packer's problem of meat disposal, because rather than let meat spoil he must sell it for any price that he can get. When the packer buys live animals he has no way of foreseeing exactly what the demand for meat is going to be a week or two later; he knows only what meat is worth at the time the animals are bought, and this is the only basis he has to go by. He may anticipate a larger demand than occurs and send too much meat to some particular market, and under such conditions he often has to sell at a loss rather than let it spoil. Or the demand may be heavy for chucks and light for hind quarters, with a resulting scarcity of one cut and oversupply of the other. These vagaries of demand are absolutely uncontrollable.

The supply of live stock at the large markets varies from day to day and from week to week, and can not be controlled by the packers. Most manufacturers can order such quantities of raw materials as they desire, and have them delivered at convenient dates. Not so in the packing industry. Live stock comes to market in a constant but unsteady stream. The packers have to absorb this supply of raw materials, even if the market for dressed meat is poor. When the demand for meats is slack and prices are declining, and the packer has all the stuff he can carry, competition among buyers is listless, and the packer must naturally try to buy live animals at lower prices in an effort to avoid loss in the sale of the meat. It is the pressure of trade conditions during such a situation over which he has no control that forces the packer to buy at lower prices if he can; he can't be expected to deliberately buy animals at prices which apparently will result in loss after conversion into dressed meats.

How different it is when the demand for dressed meats is brisk, the meat stocks are low, and the live-stock receipts are light! The buyers of the packers are in the market bright and early, with orders to get the stuff; they compete actively with each other and with shippers, and the price goes up. Although this happens just as often as the other occurrence—in fact, much oftener during recent years—it is accepted as a matter of course.

These two points, that the packer can not control the demand for meats nor the supply of live stock, are of fundamental importance. If the packer could set a definite price for his meats and could then control his purchase of live stock and output of meats, as in the case of the ordinary manufacturer, who sets a price for his product and regulates the purchase of material, and the output of goods in accordance with the quantity that can be sold at the price set, the situation would be different. But no! There are too many uncontrollable factors: The demand for meat and by-products; the supply of live animals coming on the market; the perishability of the product, which makes it necessary to sell meat before it deteriorates, regardless of price. All these things, together with the fact that if prices were artificially boosted consumption would be curtailed, point to the absurdity of the charge that the packers control prices.

Dealers and shippers in live-stock markets offer effective competition: Besides the packers there is another set of buyers in every live-stock market, who have an important influence on prices. These are the dealers and shippers. Just as soon as the price in any single market sags below what a dealer believes it ought to be, or will be the next day, he immediately steps in and buys. Or, if he sees that the price has gone low enough to yield a possible profit by shipping to some other market, he buys and takes a chance that the other market will stay up long enough for him to get his stock there. In other words, there are those in every market who stand ready to buy whenever the price falls below what they believe conditions justify; they have a steady effect on the market; their operations help to keep the various markets of the country "in line" with each other.

Price fluctuations are not so severe as is generally thought, and frequent fluctuations indicate free competition: Over short periods the fluctuations in the price of live stock are not severe, as compared with the prices of most other commodities. An increase in the price of steers from $12.50 to $12.60 represents a change of less than 1 per cent; an increase from $12.50 to $13 represents a change of only 4 per cent.

Packers do not like price fluctuations any better than do live-stock producers, and do not benefit by them. In fact, the packers have two sets of fluctuating prices to contend with—those of live stock and those of dressed meats. As pointed out before, one of the packers' principal problems is to know market conditions so thoroughly that he can buy live stock and sell meats a week or two later in such a way as to average his quarter-of-a-cent net profit, notwithstanding the fluctuations in prices of both factors.

Furthermore, frequent price fluctuations represent a high degree of competition rather than the reverse. A study of the markets for other commodities proves this statement. Where competition is continuous and severe, as in an organized wheat market, the price oscillates continuously, but only an eighth of a cent at a time. In the potato market, which is less highly organized and where competition is not so severe, the price remains constant for days at a time, and jumps or falls perhaps 5 cents a bushel. Steel rails remained for years at $28 a ton! As a general rule, the less severe the competition the less frequent the fluctuations in price.

Price fluctuations are caused primarily by changes in the demand for meat on the one hand and the changes in the supply of live stock on the other. The marketings of live stock are uneven, both within a single week and over long periods. Only by bringing about a steady demand for meat products and a better regulation of meat supply and of live-stock marketings can the severity of live-stock price fluctuations be reduced.

The prices of cattle, hogs, and sheep do not move together, nor do the prices of different grades of the same kind of animal. It frequently happens that the price of steers may be advancing, while the price of hogs remains constant or even falls. The market for fancy steers may be dull, whereas the market for lower grades is active. This is another definite indication that prices are the result of competition, and that they are determined by conditions of supply and demand.

The packing business could not be transacted successfully at arbitrary or fixed prices. Our business of buying and selling has to be done "at the market," because, as pointed out above, we neither control the supply of our raw material nor the demand for our finished product. To set an arbitrary price on live stock would result either in encouraging too large a supply or in keeping live stock off the market. To set an arbitrary price for meats would mean either that there would not be enough sold to use up the supply or else that there wouldn't be enough to go around. Fresh meats are perishable, and we have to sell them for what we can get before they spoil. No set of men could set arbitrary prices all along the line and conduct the business successfully. Market prices govern, and we have to follow them.

SUMMARY OF REPLY TO QUESTION 3.

In our reply to question 3 we believe we have established the following facts:

1. The organization of the whole marketing process for live stock and meats appears to have ample economic justification.

2. The development of large houses in the packing industry, as in many other lines of business, has come about because of greater efficiency of large-scale production and marketing.

3. The packers' gross margin to cover expenses and profits is astonishingly small and accounts for but a small proportion of the total spread between farm price of live stock and the retail price of meats. The farmers get nearly 90 per cent of the prices received by the packer for his dressed meat and by-products, and from two-thirds to three-quarters of final retail prices.

4. The profits of Swift & Co. over a period of years have averaged less than 3 cents on every dollar of sales. On either a "per-head" or invested-capital basis they appear to be reasonably moderate.

5. The larger profits of 1916–17 have been caused principally by a steady increase in values of goods in process of manufacturing and marketing, and corresponding losses on a future declining market must be provided for.

6. Fresh meats are perishable and have to be sold within a short time for what they will bring; the demand for meats is continuously fluctuating and can not be controlled. Similarly the supply of live stock fluctuates greatly from week to week and can not be controlled. All the facts of the case indicate that there is free competition in both the dressed-meat and the live-stock markets.

Question 2. "The meat packer stands between the producers of meat animals on the one hand and the retail distributor of their products on the other. In what respects, if any, does either of these three agencies, in your opinion, fail to perform its proper function in serving the ultimate consumer?"

Question 4. "What, if any, are the economic weaknesses of the existing system, and what remedies do you suggest for any existing evils?"

Since these two questions are so similar in character we are taking the liberty of answering them together.

WEAKNESSES IN PRODUCTION AND MARKETING OF LIVE ANIMALS.

1. Uneven marketing of live stock.—The quantity of live stock marketed fluctuates greatly from day to day and from week to week. In the first place, shipments are concentrated too heavily into two days of the week, as shown by the accompanying Diagram II, which gives the average receipts of cattle at Chicago for each day of the week for the two months, November and December, 1916. More serious than this concentration within the week are the recurrent gluts and scarcities of live stock in the principal markets, as indicated by Diagram III, which gives the receipts of cattle and hogs at seven large markets for each week of 1916. This uneven marketing is due partly to insufficient knowledge on the part of shippers concerning market conditions and prospects. There is no way of forecasting exactly what conditions will be when a load of live stock reaches the market, but improvement in this respect can be made through the means of more authentic and comprehensive market reports than have heretofore been issued. The Office of Markets of the United States Department of Agriculture has recently extended its Market News Service to include the prices and movements of live stock and market conditions and prices of dressed meat, and this will undoubtedly be beneficial in bringing about a more even marketing and in lessening the severity of price fluctuations. It might even be possible for the Federal Trade Commission and the Office of Markets of the United States Department of Agriculture, in cooperation with live-stock exchanges, commission men, and shippers, to inaugurate a system which would have the effect of controlling live-stock shipments, so as to make the receipts at the principal markets more uniform and more in accord with market requirements.

2. Extensive speculation in cattle feeding.—The buying up of cattle for the purpose of feeding them for market is, of course, a legitimate as well as a specialized business. It is, however, an exceedingly speculative one, and one that should not be entered into lightly without an expert knowledge of feeding, as well as an intimacy with market conditions. It appears that ofttimes too many men without the proper qualifications go into this business and suffer losses. It would be much better in many such cases if the farmer who raised the animal in the first place had done his own feeding. The promiscuous speculation in feeders also results in an unnecessary amount of transporting of animals from place to place.

3. Inefficient production of live stock on farms.—Although there has been a vast improvement in live-stock production, there are still many farmers who raise poor breeds of animals, which do not yield the greatest possible amount of weight for the quantity of feeds consumed. There are also many losses from disease, which could be avoided by a better knowledge of live-stock raising. The United States Department of Agriculture estimates that the annual loss from disease and exposure runs from something over 3 per cent in the case of cattle to over 6 per cent in the case of hogs, and that the aggregate loss of cattle, hogs, and sheep from these causes is over $200,000,000 a year.

The remedy for this situation is to be found only through the gradual education of farmers, and this is the province of the Federal Department of Agriculture and the State agricultural colleges.

4. Practices of commission men and dealers in the large live-stock markets.—The functions of these middlemen are necessary and important, but it is acknowledged that occasionally commission men fill outside orders from their own consignments, and that sometimes dealers fill such orders from stock that they own themselves. The live-stock exchanges have taken cognizance of these practices and are trying to eliminate them.

5. Inefficiency of local stock buyers and shippers.—In sections of the country where live stock is not raised on a large enough scale to permit individual farmers to ship in carloads, local stock buyers go about from farm to farm and buy up the small offerings of individual farmers, and combine them for carload shipments. There are often four or five such buyers at a single country point, resulting in duplication of effort and in relatively large overhead expense for each shipper.

One remedy for this situation is the development of cooperative shipping associations by the farmers themselves, in sections of the country where stock is raised on a small scale. Such associations have been developing very rapidly in the Northwest, especially in Minnesota. They save unnecessary expense of driving around from farm to farm, and avoid the duplication of effort which results when there are a number of independent buyers at a single shipping point.

WEAKNESSES CONNECTED WITH THE PACKING INDUSTRY.

1. Fluctuating supply of live stock.—The uneven marketing of live stock, discussed above, is a weakness of the present system, not only from the standpoint of the stockman but it is a serious disadvantage to the packer. Since the offerings of live stock at the central markets have to be absorbed within a short time after their arrival, this means that the packers have to buy uneven quantities of their raw material from day to day—a condition that almost no other kind of manufacturer has to face. This means that animals have to be slaughtered, and meat marketed, in uneven quantities, and not in accordance with the demand for meats.

2. Uneven marketing of meats.—Although the quantities of live stock marketed from week to week fluctuate more than do the quantities of dressed meat marketed, yet the distributing organizations of the packers have not reached such perfection but that there is often an oversupply or undersupply, of meats in large consuming markets. When there is an oversupply, the price has to be cut in order to move the perishable goods before they spoil; when there is an undersupply, competition of purchasers forces the price up. The net result of these gluts and scarcities is a constantly fluctuating price, which could be largely avoided if the packers could foresee more accurately the quantities needed in individual markets. Acting individually, the large packers are probably doing as well in this respect as could be expected, inasmuch as they have well-organized selling branches with expert managers at their heads.

3. Loss by condemnation.—A third matter that may be considered a weakness, but one for which the packers are not responsible, is the fact that the packers have to stand the burden of loss resulting from the condemnation of diseased animals after they are slaughtered. This loss, by becoming an expense to the packers, is reflected back to all producers through prices paid, and not to the particular producers who ship diseased animals, who, therefore, are not penalized. This situation tends more to encourage than to discourage the marketing of diseased animals, and is one reason why the efforts to eradicate disease have not been more effective than they have.

STOCKYARDS.

In addition to the weaknesses alluded to above, it is often claimed that the financial interest in some of the stockyards by packers is unfortunate. As a matter of fact, the principal reason why packers have become interested in yards at all has been to develop them to the highest point of efficiency. When a live-stock market is young and undeveloped, the opportunity to make profits is hardly sufficient to induce private capital to enter the business; it has, therefore, devolved on the packing companies to develop the yards in some cases, so as to establish a market which will attract shipments, and to provide facilities for the proper handling of animals, and this the packers have done.

Since the primary desire of the packers in connection with stockyards is efficient service, Swift & Co. would be perfectly willing to relinquish such financial interests as it has in stockyards, provided it can be assured that the present high standard of efficiency in operation be continued.

Furthermore, if the Federal Trade Commission should discover any features of stockyards management and operation which are unsatisfactory, Swift & Co. will be glad to cooperate to the fullest extent in their improvement.

MARKET PAPERS.

Another feature that has frequently been attacked is the financial control by packers of some of the live-stock market papers. We admit that in principle it is not the best plan for a market-reporting paper to be financially controlled by any firm dealing in the commodities which are quoted in such a paper. But here again, the only reason why Swift & Co. has ever interested itself in such a paper has been to develop an efficiently managed and meritorious paper—one that will be a credit to and an advertisement of the market which it represents. As in the case of the stockyards, Swift & Co. would be glad to relinquish its interests in market papers, provided it can be assured that such papers will be efficiently edited and managed.

There are various other complaints made against the packers which we shall be glad to answer at any time if the Federal Trade Commission cares to go into them.

GENERAL CONCLUSIONS.

In answering your questions we have shown that the prices of meats have not risen as much as the prices of commodities in general, nor as much as the prices of live animals. What increase of price there has been has been due to natural causes and not to any causes inherent in the packing industry alone.

The reason why live stock and meat prices have not advanced as much as the prices of other commodities is that there has been an increased supply of live stock. This is an extremely significant fact, especially when it is realized that the record marketings of live stock in 1916 have been accompanied by an increase in the number of live animals on farms. This is a clear proof that live-stock production is profitable. There are numerous other evidences of this fact: Experiment stations report handsome profits from their feeding activities; the steady increase in land values in stock-raising sections furnishes another proof, because land values depend on the profit-producing powers of the land; the testimony of innumerable stockmen also points to the same conclusion. If the trade commission requires any further evidence on this point, we can furnish the names of a large number of growers who have achieved very satisfactory results.

In fact, all who are really conversant with the industry know that stockmen and feeders have been making unusually large profits during the past few months, and that the accusation that the packers hold down the prices of animals to such an extent as to discourage live-stock production falls to the ground.

It has also been shown that the whole organization of the marketing process for live stock and meats is fundamentally sound, and that all agencies perform necessary functions. The development of large concerns has come about through greater efficiency and economy which result from division of labor in production, utilization of by-products, large-scale and effective marketing methods, and the ability to produce the best and most uniform quality of meats from the raw materials available.

The packers make astonishingly small gross margins between farmer and consumer, and their net profits are not only infinitesimal per pound of meat sold but they yield a return on capital invested which is only normal and reasonable. The increased profits of the past few months have been due primarily to the steady increase in values of stock in process of slaughtering, dressing, curing, and marketing, and will be counterbalanced by reduced profits, if not actual losses, when the market begins to recede. Furthermore, the increased profits of the packers have been as nothing compared with the profits earned in other industries under war conditions.

It has also been pointed out that the packers purchase animals and sell meat in open competitive markets. There are conditions affecting the demand for meats in principal consuming markets, and effecting the fluctuating supply of live stock from week to week, which are the real factors determining prices, and over which the packers could exercise no control, even if they should try to do so collectively.

Finally, it has been pointed out that there are certain definite weaknesses in the system of marketing live stock, such as the uneven marketing of live animals, the uneconomic practice of country shippers, and certain practices of commission men and dealers, all of which are possible of improvement. We have also pointed out certain practices and conditions which may be considered weaknesses of the present organization and methods of the packing industry, and Swift & Co. expresses its willingness to cooperate to the fullest extent with the Federal Trade Commission, or under its control and direction, to make such changes as may seem reasonable and desirable.

In discussing the weaknesses of the system we have said nothing about the retail butcher. The cost of retailing, on account of the elaborate and expensive service that consumers demand, is larger than the packer's expenses for slaughtering, transporting, and handling through branch houses, as shown in Report No. 113, United States Department of Agriculture, quoted above. We are not prepared to express an opinion on the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the retailer's expense and gross margins, and we presume that the Federal Trade Commission will satisfy itself on this point.

In presenting these answers to your questions we have attempted to stick to facts. The intimate figures concerning our costs and profits are possible of verification by your accountants who are working on our books. We believe that the packing industry is established on sound economic principles, that it has attained an exceptionally high degree of efficiency, and that the facts of the case prove that there is no ground for the suspicion prevalent in the public mind.

SWIFT & CO., UNION STOCK YARDS,
Chicago, August 22, 1918.

Hon. MARTIN B. MADDEN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I wrote you on July 3 regarding the Trade Commission's report on profiteering. Since that time another document has been issued by the Trade Commission dealing particularly with the meat-packing industry. This report has received wide circulation. It is an entirely one-sided statement of the case.

The subject is of vital importance, not only to the packing industry but to the Nation at large and to the nations associated with us in the war, who are depending upon the live-stock producers and packers of the United States to keep up a continuous supply of wholesome meat products for the civilian and fighting populations.

We consider it our duty, therefore, to put before you, as a Member of the present Congress, the inclosed statement of Swift & Co. I know that in a matter of the importance of this one you will want to be fully informed, and I earnestly urge that you give careful thought to what is said in the inclosed statement.

There is no monopoly in the packing business. Swift & Co. is in active competition with all other packers and is employing its every resource to further our successful prosecution of the war.

Such an organization, composed of over 22,000 shareholders, with over 48,000 employees, is, I am sure you will agree, entitled to the earnest consideration which we bespeak of you.

Yours, respectfully,

L. F. SWIFT, President.

STATEMENT OF SWIFT & CO., ISSUED AUGUST 19, 1918, ON SUMMARY OF THE REPORT OF THE FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION ON THE MEAT PACKING INDUSTRY OF JULY 3, 1918.

ABSTRACT OF STATEMENT OF SWIFT & CO.

Swift & Co. proclaims that it is in active competition with all other packers and can prove that the Federal Trade Commission has failed to establish its statement that the packers are in combination in restraint of trade.

Swift & Co. is glad that it has developed an organization which has been able to take care of war business and it does not believe that this is a time for the Federal Trade Commission to suggest drastic Government experiments or to throw discredit on an essential industry.

The Trade Commission's investigation was a one-sided affair; the packers were given no chance to present their side of the case; the report is so constructed that it imparts a glamour of importance and significance to matters that are trivial; the whole report is biased and presents many matters in a false light.

The commission presents only such facts as it could use by adroit construction and inference to appear to substantiate the thesis it set out to prove. It omits scores of salient facts which prove that the packers are in competition with each other; that the profits are so small as to have practically no effect on prices; that the packers have performed an indispensable service to the country during peace and war times.

The commission failed to mention that the packers are now operating under Government supervision and that their profits have been limited by the Food Administration since November 1, 1917.

In attacking packer ownership of stockyards, the commission does not explain that the principal reason why packers have become interested in stockyards has been to provide proper and efficient facilities for the care and sale of live stock. Such ownership gives no control over prices. Swift & Co. would be willing to relinquish its interest in stockyards if the continuance of efficient operation can be assured. Stockyards are now under the control of the United States Department of Agriculture.

Swift & Co. owns refrigerator cars because the railroads refused to furnish them. Swift & Co. is willing to leave it to the judgment of the Railroad Administration, which now has general supervision over our cars, as to whether service can be improved by the Government's taking them over.

Analysis of all the reasons advanced by the commission for its belief that the packers are in combination with each other shows that not one of them is valid. The commission bases its case primarily on the fact that the proportions of live-stock receipts bought by the different packers remain fairly constant from year to year, and that, therefore, there must be an arbitrary division of receipts.

The fact is that the packers are in such active competition with each other that not one of them is willing to lose ground to the others in volume of business handled. Accordingly, they watch each other so closely that no single packer is able to increase his purchases inordinately.

The Trade Commission's own figures, however, show that Swift & Co. has been able to increase its proportion in four years to such an extent that it slaughtered about 90,000 more cattle in 1917 than if it had not increased its proportion since 1913.

Division of shipments of dressed meats to eastern markets, another matter referred to in the report, was abandoned in 1902.

There is nothing illegitimate or suggestive of conspiracy in restraint of trade in the fact that the packers have maintained a joint fund for mutual protection from unfair attacks against their oleomargarine business. Associative action among competitors for such purposes is found in many trades.

The suggestion that the Government operate branch houses of the packers as public markets is impracticable and visionary and indicates how little the Trade Commission understands the relation between branch-house organization and large-scale packing units, or the extent to which the efficiency of branch-house operations depends on skill, experience, and personal initiative. To attack branch-house organization as giving the large packer an advantage over the small packer is merely to attack bigness in itself with its resulting efficiency and indispensable service.

The Federal Trade Commission, even by purposely omitting all facts favorable to the packers, has failed to prove that the packers are in combination. They are in active competition with each other and have no control over prices.

STATEMENT OF SWIFT & CO.

Swift & Co. rejoices that through its long experience in the packing industry it has been able to develop such large and efficient packing units and nation-wide and even international distributing organizations as to have been able to serve our armies abroad and the armies and civilian populations of the allies during this period of war emergency. Because of our extensive facilities, we have been able to accept orders for millions of pounds of meat from the Food Administration and begin shipment of such orders within a few hours after they have been received.

At this time governmental as well as industrial energies should be centered on those things which facilitate our war activities. If the recent report of the Federal Trade Commission on the packing industry should result in drastic Government experiments in the handling of that industry, the results might be serious from a war-time standpoint. We do not believe that the report will result in any such drastic measures; even so, it tends to throw discredit on an essential industry; it arouses suspicions in the minds of the public; and it possibly lessens confidence among live-stock producers, some of whom may for this reason slacken their efforts to continually increase meat production.

The report of the Federal Trade Commission states that the five large packers are in combination in restraint of trade. Swift & Co. is in open and active competition with all other packers. Although a department of the Government naturally carries a great deal of authority in such a matter, and although the report of the Trade Commission may sound plausible to a great many readers, especially those who have never studied the packing business, we believe that we can prove to any unprejudiced person that the facts and insinuations in the Trade Commission's report do not substantiate the charge that there is monopoly in the packing industry.

It should be understood in the first place that the whole investigation of the Trade Commission has been a one-sided affair. Probably no big American industry has ever been subjected to such scrutiny without having been given an opportunity to present its side of the case or to explain data and correspondence gleaned from the private files of its executives. At the beginning of the investigation during the summer of 1917 the Trade Commission promised a fair hearing to the packers before any report was published. Aside from five general questions that were submitted in writing to Swift & Co. and answered, over a year ago, this company has had no opportunity to be heard. It has been an ex parte investigation from start to finish.

The Federal Trade Commission's report is adroitly constructed. It succeeds in imparting a glamour of importance and significance to trivial matters; it describes occurrences which are perfectly reasonable, legitimate, and ethical in themselves in such a way as to suggest ulterior motives and purposeful wrongdoing; it quotes letters and fragments of letters in such a way as to give a totally wrong impression concerning the relations between the large packers; and it has failed to use hundreds of letters which might have been taken from our files showing keen competition and rivalry among the packers, where it took one that by sinister construction seems to indicate collusive action.

Important facts omitted: The investigation of the packing industry was supposed to have been a complete and dispassionate one. Unfortunately, however, on account of its one-sided character, it neglects to mention many fundamental and significant facts that one would expect to find in such a report.

The Trade Commission never mentions, for example, that the packing industry has been operating under license and has had its profit limited by the Food Administration since November 1, 1917. It says nothing about the important part that we have played in the development of the live-stock industry and in the supplying of all parts of the country with a continuous supply of fresh and wholesome meats. It says nothing about the low unit costs of preparing and shipping meat to market due to large-scale production and elimination of waste. It says nothing of the minuteness of our profits per pound of product handled, a circumstance which destroys the popular notion that packers' profits account for high prices of meats.

In attempting to prove that the five large packers are working together, the Trade Commission neglects to mention numerous evidences that active competition exists. It says nothing of the rivalries evident from correspondence gleaned from the packers' files; it says nothing of the relation between live-stock prices and dressed-meat prices and how their concurrent fluctuations offer as good an illustration of the law of supply and demand as can be found in any trade; it says nothing of the fact that packers' profits fluctuate from week to week and that during the year ended June 30, 1917, Swift & Co. lost money on its beef operations during 13 out of 52 weeks.

The report fails to say that competition is evident from the fact that retail buyers shop around from the branch house of one packer to the branch house of another, finding differences in prices for qualities desired; it says nothing about the competition of shippers and speculators in the principal live-stock markets; it says nothing about the competition between markets which automatically keeps prices in line in different sections of the country and makes impossible any manipulation of live-stock prices; it does not explain that fresh meat is a perishable commodity that has to be sold within a few days for whatever it will bring; it never even considers war-time problems and the important part that the packing industry is playing; in short, the commission avoids the presentation of all facts and circumstances that definitely controvert the thesis that it tries to establish.

The spirit of the report: From a scientific point of view it is unfortunate that such an important Government document should so definitely reflect the temper of its authors and should contain such glaring instances of prejudice. Before analyzing the main body of the report the following enumeration of some of the most conspicuous examples of misleading presentation of facts will serve to illustrate the spirit in which the report was prepared:

On page 14 it says that "Armour is the only one of the big packers who appears to be interested in the grain trade, although James A. Patten, a large stockholder of Swift & Co., is also one of the important factors in the cereal markets." The implication is that Swift & Co. has interests in the grain trade. Mr. Patten happens to be a stockholder of Swift & Co. for investment purposes, just as he is a stockholder in other corporations. He has nothing to do with the management of Swift & Co., and Swift & Co. has no interest in the grain trade.

On page 39 (and referred to on page 9) there is reproduced part of a letter written by a committee of "confidential employees" of Swift & Co. before the Trade Commission investigation began, in which it is said: "We believe that as it stands to-day nothing could stop criminal prosecutions." The inference is that representatives of the packers believed themselves guilty and subject to prosecution. The fact is that all this committee meant was that the attitude among certain stock raisers and among radical Congressmen in Washington was such as to indicate that they would probably attempt to bring about criminal prosecution.

On page 41 the Trade Commission gives the three following principal causes of violent fluctuations in the price of live stock: first, collusive manipulation by the packers; second, disagrements among the packers; third, raising prices in a particular market to keep out a competitor. Lack of evidence to substantiate these reasons will be shown in this analysis; the matter is mentioned here to indicate the absolute failure of the commission to consider the fundamental economic principles underlying the formation of market prices, such as fluctuating receipts of live stock and the varying demand for meat.

In connection with this question of price fluctuations the commission quotes on the same page from an official of the American National Live-stock Association to the effect that price fluctuations are serious because "fully three-quarters of the cattle are bought on the days of heavy receipts, reducing the average cost far below the average daily prices." Previous to recent regulations by the Food Administration, the bulk of receipts arrived at market on Mondays and Wednesdays; this quotation infers that the prices on those days are lower than the prices on other days. The Monthly Crop Report of the United States Department of Agriculture for January 31, 1916, says: "An examination of the market quotations for the bulk of sales of beef cattle by days of week indicates that quotations rule highest on the days of largest receipts; that is, on Mondays and Wednesdays, and lowest on days of smallest receipts." A study of daily hog prices for 1917, as published in the Drovers' Journal Yearbook, shows that average prices for all Mondays and Wednesdays throughout the year were slightly higher than the average prices for the other days. This indicates that the Trade Commission must have a very imperfect grasp of live-stock prices.

The part played by Mr. Heney: The Trade Commission upholds and praises the work of Francis J. Heney, who was employed as a special attorney during the course of the investigation. Mr. Heney's sensational methods, his unfair use of testimony drawn from prejudiced witnesses, his device of holding hearings to make public his insinuations without giving the packers an opportunity to present their side of the case, and his frequent announcement of serious charges that were not substantiated by fact are too well known to need comment here. We submit that when the attorney of the Trade Commission publicly charges the packers with collusion on Government contracts whereas the only basis for such a charge was that they were called into conference by, and in company with, officials of the Food Administration—conferences expressly sanctioned by the President of the United States—there is no reason to expect fair and impartial results from that portion of the investigation in which Mr. Heney took part.

EXTENT OF PACKERS' INTERESTS.

The foregoing incidents, which might be multiplied indefinitely, are unimportant in themselves but they indicate the general spirit of the report. To proceed with the line of argument used, the commission tries to show the extent of the interests of the five large packers by saying that they account for about "70 per cent of the live stock slaughtered by all packers and slaughterers engaged in interstate commerce;" that they have extensive foreign interests; and that they have reached out into other fields which have no relation to the packing business.

Proportion of total meat business: The commission claims that the packers juggle figures by saying that the five largest account for only 33⅓ per cent of the total meat production of the country, because in such an estimate they include all animals slaughtered on farms. Mr. Hoover, in a recent public statement, said that the large packers accounted for less than 40 per cent of the total meat supply of the country. The commission overlooks the fact that the large packers sell meat in small country towns all over the United States, and that they come in direct competition with home-killed live stock; also, that home-killed meats constitute a potential competition that affects live-stock and meat values in the most distant cities.

Be that as it may, and assuming that the five large packers account for approximately 70 per cent of the total interstate slaughter, this is nothing alarming when it is considered that this business is done by five companies in competition with each other—a situation that will be established in the course of this analysis. There are many industries in the country where a single corporation accounts for as large or a larger proportion of the total output as do the five large packers together.

The fact that the large packers have heavy foreign interests will, of course, be readily admitted, but this is of little consequence in an argument to prove that monopoly exists. The statement that the packers have rached out into other fields, however, is worthy of consideration, because the commission implies that there has been no justification for so doing, and that the only object has been to get control of the food supply of the Nation.

Butter, eggs, and other products: Swift & Co. has gone into no field that is not closely related to the packing industry, either in the utilization of by-products or in the utilization of its vast selling organization, which was developed primarily to take care of its meat business. The handling of such commodities as butter, eggs, cheese, poultry, and canned goods has been prompted by the needs of its customers and by the desire to use most economically its system of branch houses. The greater the volume of merchandise we can put through our elaborate distributing organization the lower the unit marketing costs and the smaller the "spread" between farm prices and consumer prices not only on butter, eggs, etc., but on meats as well. The reason that we have developed such a large volume in these products is that we represent a more economical and efficient method of marketing than is afforded by other marketing agencies. Furthermore, our system results in direct shipment in car lots from country collecting points to city distributing stations; it avoids rehandling and reshipping, and the goods go through in better condition; they are more uniform in quality; and there is less loss from waste.

Hides and leather: The commission says that the large packers hold a dominant position with reference to hides and leather and that they tan a large part of the leather produced in the United States. The large packers naturally supply the same proportion of hides as of animals that they kill, or less than 40 per cent of the total domestic supply. Two or three of the largest packers have their own tanneries in order to insure a steady outlet for a part of their hides rather than be obliged to depend on the vagaries of the hide market. They tan less than 25 per cent, however, of the leather produced in the United States.

The Trade Commission gives a wrong impression when it says that the large packers have an advantage over independent packers and butchers because their hides are arbitrarily given a higher grading as "packer hides," whereas the others are known as "country hides." This distinction results merely from the fact that tanners value packer hides more highly than country hides, due to the fact that packer hides are removed from the animals and cured more skillfully and uniformly, and hence are of better quality; for this reason only are the packers responsible for the higher value of their hides. The packers are also accused of hoarding hides during 1917, whereas the truth is that they sold more hides than ever before and got rid of them as rapidly as the market would absorb them at constantly falling prices.

INSTRUMENTS OF CONTROL.

The Trade Commission argues that the large packers achieve control of the industry through ownership of stockyards, refrigerator cars, and cold-storage plants, through their branch-house distributive organizations, and by means of interests in banks and real estate.

Ownership of stockyards: The functions of stockyards are generally misunderstood. They are market places, supplied with pens for the animals and with watering and feeding facilities. Live stock arrives at the yards consigned to commission men, who sell to the buyers of the packers and to shippers, dealers, and speculators. Every packing center must have proper and efficiently operated yards in order to care for the animals. The principal reason that the packers have become interested in the yards has been to provide such proper facilities. Investment in stockyards, except in the very largest markets, is not attractive enough to invite outside capital. Packer ownership has resulted in the development of efficient market places that would not otherwise have existed.

Packer ownership of stockyards gives no control over prices of live stock and no control over the commission men in the yards. Yardage and feed charges are reasonable, and they are uniform to all patrons. Swift & Co. is proud of what it has done to help the live-stock industry as well as itself by developing efficient stockyards. Only recently Government regulation of yards has been established under the Bureau of Markets, United States Department of Agriculture. Furthermore, Swift & Co. would be perfectly willing to relinquish its interest in stockyards if the public demands it, especially if the continuance of their efficient operation can be guaranteed.

Refrigerator cars: It is true that only a large concern, with a nation-wide organization, can think of operating refrigerator cars in large numbers. The only reason that Swift & Co. ever embarked in this enterprise was that the railroads refused to furnish the cars. Swift & Co. has a fleet of nearly 7,000 such cars, and they form an integral part of the service rendered the public. We distribute these cars in accordance with our needs in various parts of the country, and, in order to facilitate their movement, we have them closely followed up to see that none get sidetracked or delayed. Swift & Co., however, would have no objection to their being taken over by the Government, especially as they have been a losing proposition financially to the company for several years. The only question that should be considered at present is this: Could Swift & Co. ship over 1,000 carloads of meat in a single week to the American Army at home and abroad and to the allies (as it did during a recent week) as punctually and efficiently under Government ownership of refrigerator cars as under the present system?

Cold-storage plants are necessary in the handling of perishable products, especially those of seasonal production. The holding of goods from seasons of bountiful supply to months of scarcity is an economic necessity and is specifically permitted by the Food Administration. Swift & Co. rents space to other dealers during those seasons of the year when it does not use its full capacity with its own products; during the heaviest storage periods we do not have enough space for our own products, and hence we have to store large quantities in public warehouses. The packers own but a small proportion of the total cold-storage capacity of the country.

Branch houses: Branch houses are located in all large towns throughout the country and are necessary for the proper holding and distribution of the commodities sold. They are a necessary adjunct to large, centralized packing plants, because under this system goods have to be marketed in far-distant localities. Of course, only a large company can undertake nation-wide distribution through such branch houses, but the branch-house organization in itself furnishes one of the best evidences of competition among the large packers. In addition to the five largest packers, there are a number of others that are large enough to maintain branch-house selling organizations; in the large cities there are always a number of packers represented. Retail butchers, in buying their meats, shop around from the branch house of one packer to those of the others, making their purchases where prices are lowest for the qualities desired.

Banks and real estate: The Trade Commission has gone to absurd extremes in trying to connect Swift & Co. with important banking interests. Many of the banks listed in the report, in which Swift interests are represented, are small neighborhood banks, in which members of the Swift family or employees of Swift & Co. have small personal investments. In so far as those who are connected with Swift & Co. are also interested in cattle-loan banks, they are satisfied that they have helped the live-stock industry by providing borrowing facilities for live-stock raisers and feeders, and by popularizing live-stock paper. We submit that there is nothing in this charge that indicates monopoly or undue control of live-stock facilities; the same applies to the references to ownership of real estate.

EVIDENCE OF COMBINATION.

The Trade Commission bases its conclusion that the large packers are in conspiracy to restrain trade on the ground (1) that they are largely under the management of the same families that established them, and that ownership rests in the hands of relatively few people; (2) that they jointly own various properties; (3) that the packers once had "beef pools"; (4) that memoranda from the files of Mr. G. F. Sulzberger indicate that he had interviews with other packers along about 1913 and 1914 concerning meat shipments; (5) that the percentages of live-stock receipts bought by the different packers remain approximately constant over a period of time and in individual markets; (6) that the large packers divide their foreign business; (7) that correspondence indicates that one of the packers tried to manipulate the cheese market in Wisconsin; and finally, (8) that the packers maintain joint funds to defray expenses undertaken in common.

The commission's case rests on the accuracy of these charges, and the extent to which they prove that the packers are actually in combination with each other. If it can be shown that there is nothing in these charges to prove conspiracy, the elaborately constructed case of the Trade Commission falls to the ground. These points will be considered in turn.

(1) That the management of the large packers is largely in the hands of the families that established them—a fact which is a source of pride to those families—proves nothing in itself. That the ownership lies in the hands of relatively few people proves nothing except that it would be easier for them to get together than if the ownership were more widely dispersed.

(2) The joint ownership of properties is greatly exaggerated by the Federal Trade Commission. There are cases where a part or the whole of the capital stock of certain stockyards, cattle-loan banks, and other facilities is owned by two or more packers. In other words, financial resources of large packers have in some cases been combined to establish facilities that otherwise did not exist or that existed in imperfect form. Swift & Co. submits that in so far as it owns stock in corporations in which other packers also own stock, this does not represent evidence of combination among the packers to restrain trade or to influence prices. If there is anything in this that is incompatible with the public interest, we shall be glad to make any adjustments advised by any competent and impartial tribunal that may be designated by the Government.

(3) The fact that the packers once had "beef pools" is not germane. The "beef pools"—that is, the arrangements whereby the quantity of beef that could be shipped by each packer to various large eastern markets—were discontinued in 1902. Although public opinion would probably not countenance such arrangements at present, they were undoubtedly of benefit to the public at large, in that they helped to avoid recurrent gluts and scarcities in eastern markets, and tended to steady prices.

(4) Evidence that Mr. G. F. Sulzberger had interviews with the other packers along about 1913–14 is introduced to convey the idea that there still was some control of meat shipments at that time. There was no control, or "pool," or agreed division of meat shipments. If there had been any cooperative arrangement for mutual protection, instead of keen competition, possibly Mr. Sulzberger would not have been so dissatisfied with the business his company was doing as to have sold out shortly afterwards to New York bankers.

Furthermore, the importance of all references to "beef pools," so far as they have a bearing on the present situation, is torn down by the Federal Trade Commission's own admission on page 26 that "there is apparently no 'dressed-meat pool' at the present time such as existed in the nineties, for the reason that it would be as useless as a fifth wheel on a wagon."

(5) Having to abandon the "beef pool" idea as proof of conspiracy, the Trade Commission is forced to rest its case primarily on the fact that the percentages of live-stock receipts bought by the various packers remain practically constant. This circumstance, together with memoranda and correspondence referring to these percentages, is accepted as conclusive evidence that the packers are in a definite conspiracy to divide live-stock receipts in definite proportions, and that this enables them to control prices of live stock and prices of meats.

We admit that the percentage purchased by each packer remains fairly constant, and that, on the face of it, this might appear to one outside of the packing industry as suggesting collusion. To one in the packing industry, however, it is merely an indication of keen competition and rivalry among the several large packers.

We, Swift & Co., are very jealous of the other packers in the various markets, and do not intend to let these concerns increase their businesses at our expense. We keep a weekly record of the receipts of live stock in the different markets, and figure out the percentage of total receipts that we obtain, and compare that percentage with the percentage of total receipts for the same week during the previous year. We measure our success in maintaining our position by continuously making such comparison, and we follow carefully what the other packers are doing.

Undoubtedly, the other packers feel exactly the same way toward us, and measure their success and progress in a similar manner. We are constantly striving to increase our percentage of the business, but any other packer naturally would not willingly permit us to greatly increase our percentage of the business at the expense of his volume.

The only way we could do so would be to pay prices high enough above the market to get more than our usual volume; but since, due to competition, dressed meat is handled on a profit of only a fraction of a cent a pound, it would be a disastrous thing for us to attempt. Even if we should attempt it, other packers would undoubtedly prevent us by meeting our competition and suffering losses, rather than permit us to permanently get part of their trade.

Viewed in its proper light, therefore, the bugaboo of approximately constant percentages turns out to be an evidence of rivalry and intense competition. On account of the close observation of each other's purchases, no single packer is able to substantially increase his business at the expense of the others.

Nevertheless the percentages taken by the different packers do vary to a certain extent from month to month and from year to year. In the table shown on page 27 Swift & Co.'s percentage of total cattle purchases increased from 33.90 per cent in 1913 to 35.07 in 1917, an increase of 1.17 per cent in four years; this apparently slight increase meant that in 1917 Swift & Co. slaughtered about 90,000 more cattle than if it had not increased its percentage over that of 1913.

In addition to this explanation of the reason why percentages remain constant Swift & Co. absolutely denies that it is in agreement with other packers with regard to the division of live-stock receipts. No evidence is presented by the commission as proof of such an agreement, and the letters bearing on this subject, when properly interpreted, indicate rivalry and a desire on the part of each packer to at least hold his own in the different markets.

(6) With this matter explained, there remains practically nothing on which the Trade Commission can base a claim of monopoly. So far as the division of foreign business is concerned, it is true that the large American packers, together with certain foreign companies, have had arrangements for years providing for the proportion of total shipments that each should carry between South America and England. Such a division of business was not only justifiable because it helped to make more regular the receipts of perishable meats in England, but the arrangement is countenanced by British law and has nothing to do with the problem of trade restraint in the United States. Furthermore, this arrangement is similar to the form of cooperation specifically permitted by the recent Webb bill, which is intended to encourage exportation on the part of competing firms in the United States.

Before the European war began and after the United States import duty on fresh meat had been removed Swift & Co. (through the Swift Beef Co. of London) made a contract with the Lamport & Holt Steamship Co. (a British company) providing for a certain amount of space to be used by Swift & Co. in shipments from South America to the United States. Such a contract was made necessary by the fact that there had been practically no refrigerated shipping space in the South America-New York trade and that Lamport & Holt was the only line to equip itself with the necessary refrigerated vessels to give regular service. This contract was made independently by Swift & Co., and does not represent in any way an agreed division of shipments with the other packers. Shipments to the United States have been limited only by amount of steamship space offered, and Swift & Co. has continuously been in the market for all space obtainable.

Our London representatives have always been under instructions not to enter into agreements with other packers involving division of shipments to the United States. To-day there are no shipments of refrigerated meat from South America to the United States, because of insufficiency of refrigerated vessels and shipments to England are controlled by the British Government.

(7) Correspondence presented by the Trade Commission indicates that one of the packers had attempted to influence the price of cheese on one of the "cheese boards" in Wisconsin. In quoting this correspondence an attempt is made to implicate Swift & Co. by stating in parenthesis (without explanation that the parenthetical remark was added by the commission itself) that Swift & Co. buys four-fifths of the sales of a certain concern mentioned in the correspondence. Swift & Co. has no financial interest in the concern named; it buys over 90 per cent of its Wisconsin cheese purchases from wholesale dealers in whom it has no financial interest and the remainder direct from cheese factories. It buys none on the cheese boards in that State. It has never tried to affect the quotations on the cheese boards and has never been in conspiracy with other packers or dealers to do so.

(8) There remains only the statement that the packers have maintained joint funds to defray expenses undertaken in common as proof of conspiracy. It is true that the five packers have maintained a joint fund referred to by the Trade Commission as "the oleo pool," but the expenses incurred under this arrangement have been to afford adequate protection against unfair attacks made against the oleomargarine business and the use of this product. It is a very common occurrence for competing manufacturers in various trades to adopt associative action for protective purposes; we see nothing reprehensible in this arrangement, especially as it has nothing to do with prices or division of business.

There are other cases in which the attorney of Swift & Co. has prorated the expenses of the large packers in legal cases where two or more packers were involved; attorneys of the other packers have often acted in a similar capacity. We submit that there is nothing in an arrangement of this sort that can possibly prove that the packers have acted in restraint of trade.

Conclusions on monopoly.—The foregoing discussion shows that the points made by the Trade Commission to uphold their contention that a monopoly exists have no basis in fact, and that they would not only be useless in proceeding against the packers in the courts but that they do not even represent any infractions of accepted standards of commercial ethics. There may have been instances years ago when the packers acted together in such a way as to indirectly curtail competition and to affect prices. There may also have been instances in the past where individual packers indulged in practices which have during recent years come to be considered "unfair competition." Years ago they probably received reductions from established railroad rates, just as shippers of all commodities did; so far as local price discriminations are concerned, however, Swift & Co. has been very careful to reduce prices only when forced to do so to meet competition and not to destroy competitors.

The packers are also accused of abusing their power by acquiring stock in and operating "bogus independents." Swift & Co. owns stock in a great many corporations that are not operated under the name of Swift & Co., although the policy of the company has been to gradually bring its interests under that name. Swift & Co. is interested in such corporations not for the purpose of carrying out destructive competitive policies, but has acquired them to extend its own facilities and improve its service. Here, again, Swift & Co. would be glad to make any reasonable adjustments requested by any independent and impartial tribunal that might be designated.

If the Trade Commission has definite evidence that the packers are guilty of unfair trade practices, the Trade Commission has ample power to eliminate these practices. It is Swift & Co.'s policy to live up to both the letter and the spirit of the law, and we know that we are conducting our business honestly and in active competition with all other packers. We also believe that an unprejudiced study of the Trade Commission's report and the foregoing analysis of its evidence will prove conclusively that there is no ground for the charge that the packers are conspiring together in restraint of trade.

RESULTS OF ALLEGED COMBINATION.

Packers' profits.—The Federal Trade Commission says that the packers have exported excessive profits from the people of the United States, especially during war times, but does not explain how small these profits are as compared with sales, and that they amount to only a fraction of a cent per pound on meats. A fair interpretation of packers' profits proves conclusively that they are an infinitesimal factor in prices, and that the common impression that high meat prices are due to packers' profits is utterly without foundation. It would seem that one of the vital and fundamental questions an investigation of the packing industry ought to reveal would be: What are the effects of packers' profits on prices?

Although the report states that the 1917 profit of the five large packers amounted to 21.6 per cent of their net worth, the commission failed to explain that it was very fortunate, not only for the packers but for the country, that their earnings offered some assistance in financing the larger operations and heavy high-priced stocks of goods, caused largely by the war. Swift & Co.'s inventories of goods in process and on the way to market averaged about $50,000,000 before the war; to-day they amount to about $150,000,000.

We do not consider that our book profits of the past few months have been permanently earned because they have been tied up so largely in these inventories, which are bound to decrease in value at some time. Only reasonable dividends have been paid, and even with the remainder of our profit reinvested in our business, we have had to issue additional stock to raise more funds to finance operations. The difficulties of war-time financing of a business that has to be run largely on borrowed money might well have been explained by the commission in its report.

Profits have been only large enough to maintain efficiency, and any drastic reduction of the profit now allowed by the Food Administration would undoubtedly result in making it impossible for some of the less efficient packers to continue in business.

RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE COMMISSION.

Live-stock cars.—The first recommendation of the commission is that the Government acquire, through the Railroad Administration, all live-stock cars owned by the packers. It intimates that the ownership of stock cars gives the packers a certain power of control and a manipulation of the means of transportation. During 1917 less than 1 per cent of the receipts of live stock in Chicago arrived in stock cars owned by the five large packers. It is true that Swift & Co. owns stock cars which are used in hauling animals from the Middle West to plants on the Atlantic coast through territory where the railroads do not operate stock trains as regularly as in the West. These cars are now under the supervision of the Railroad Administration, and Swift & Co. is perfectly willing to relinquish its ownership if the Railroad Administration believes that service can thereby be improved. They form an extremely insignificant factor in the operations of Swift & Co.

Stockyards.—The second recommendation is that the Government acquire the principal stockyards of the country through the Railroad Administration. As already explained on page 13, Swift & Co. has become interested in stockyards for the purpose of improving marketing facilities. Ownership of yards gives no control over the prices of live stock or the methods of trading. Although all stockyards have recently been brought under the control of the United States Department of Agriculture, here again Swift & Co. would be willing to part with its ownership if a continuance of the present standard of efficient operation can be guaranteed.

Refrigerator cars.—The third recommendation is that the Government acquire all privately owned refrigerator cars through the Railroad Administration. The reasons why Swift & Co. owns refrigerator cars were explained on page 14. It is also pointed out in that place that our cars are under the supervision of the Railroad Administration and that we would be perfectly willing to relinquish ownership if it can be shown that service during war times can thereby be improved.

Branch houses and storage plants.—We believe that the fourth suggestion of the commission that the Government acquire branch houses and cold-storage plants belonging to the packers is an impracticable one, in that it would destroy individual initiative, result in poorer handling of meats, and prove more costly. Branch houses are an essential part of a system of which large centralized packing plants are the basis. The operation of a branch house requires skill and initiative on the part of an experienced manager, and the efficiency of the organization would suffer if they were made into public markets with the manager responsible only to the Government.

In one sense the branch-house system gives the large packer an advantage over the small packer who can not afford such an organization, but to attack the packers on this score is to attack mere bigness—bigness that has made possible the development of this efficient form of marketing which has been of inestimable value to the public at large.

CONCLUSION.

It has been shown that the Federal Trade Commission, in spite of clever use of the complete and intimate data to which it had access, has not been able to prove that the large packers are in a conspiracy to restrain trade and to manipulate prices. Not only has the commission failed to establish a case against the packers, but Swift & Co. proclaims to the world that it is in active and honest competition with all other packers.

The packing industry consists of a great number of competing units—some large and some small. A few are big enough to achieve the economies and render the broad and efficient service resulting from nation-wide organization. Scores of smaller packers offer effective competition in their more localized, yet prosperous, efforts.

Competition, bigness, an open field for small producers—what other industry approaches more nearly the American ideal of business organization?

APPENDIX.

[New York Times, New York, N. Y., Aug. 10, 1918.]

However the matter is looked at, there is a scandal in the charges against the meat packers by the Federal Trade Commission. If the charges are true, no honest man would object to punishment to fit the crime when proved. If the charges are false, the scandal is in the publication of such an attack on one of the greatest agencies for winning the war, and appropriate punishment for the Trade Commission's bearing false witness would be in order. Caution is necessary in taking the charges as facts, for on the same day that the charges are made disproof is published regarding another scandal which was taken as truth too easily. * * *

* * * * * * * *

The Trade Commission's report is not necessarily malicious, even if untrue. It bears current date, but really is a survival of the time when each city slaughtered for itself. There are New Yorkers who remember when there were slaughterhouses on almost any block, and when it was a custom of school children to cluster around them to see the sights, while the blood filled the gutters. The commission's report relates to that juvenile stage of the industry, which it would like to restore, for the benefit of the neighborhood butchers who have suffered for the superior efficiency of central supply. * * *

[Boston Transcript, Boston, Mass., Aug. 9, 1918.]

The probe of the packing industry of the country by the Federal Trade Commission has resulted in a report to the President which consists of sensational charges and revolutionary recommendations.

* * * * * * * *

* * * Now is not the time to discuss, much less initiate economic revolution predicated upon conditions that certain doctrinaires believe will confront us when the war has been won. It may be that the new world into which we shall then enter will require all the Government acquisitions which the commission now urges upon the President to make, but there are those, and their number is by no means small, who prefer before taking the leap to supplement with expert opinion the quack judgments of the political "hand-me-downs" who at present constitute the controlling force in the Federal Trade Commission.

[San Francisco Chronicle, San Francisco, Cal., Aug. 10, 1918.]

* * * * * * * *

All these charges involve questions of fact to be proved or disproved before a tribunal which hears evidence on both sides. * * *

On the other hand, the Trade Commission is an accusing body which has sometimes shown animus, whose result is that the public can not assume guilt in all who fall under its condemnation. * * *

[Baltimore News, Baltimore, Md., Aug. 9, 1918.]

* * * * * * * *

It is not necessary to be a sympathizer with Swift & Co., Armour & Co., et al., to find in the Federal Trade Commission's report on their business some remarkable statements and recommendations. * * *

These practices, if actually indulged in and if the terms by which they are described have the accepted meaning, are covered by the anti-trust statutes. * * * The commission uses language that the courts have been unable to substantiate. Is that an advisable, even if it were a warrantable, thing to do at a time when the Government should be trying to keep public sentiment on an even keel?

* * * * * * * *

[Newark News, Newark, N. J., Aug. 9, 1918.]

* * * And the last move—the recommendation of the Federal Trade Commission that the Government monopolize all departments of the industry except the actual packing—looks like a gesture of despair.

* * * * * * * *

This is war time, and the first need is to guarantee that the meat products handled by the five great major groups of packers be kept moving steadily to supply the Nation's fighters and civilians and the Nation's allies. It is not contended that there has been any lack of efficiency in the performance of this huge task, which has been carried on by the packers—recently under Government direction. * * *

[St. Louis Times, St. Louis, Mo., Aug. 9, 1918.]

* * * * * * * *

The packing-house matter, however, appears to be entirely different. There doesn't seem to be any question of military necessity involved. Whatever military necessity has existed has been met by the packers with success amounting to a triumph. It would have been quite impossible for Secretary Baker to move a million men to France and feed them, to say nothing of the millions of English and French, without the well nigh perfect system developed through many years by American packers.

* * * * * * * *

[New York Tribune, New York, N. Y., Aug. 10, 1918.]

* * * Yet this letter is not forwarded to the Department of Justice for action or sent to Congress with any recommendations. Is it that the President believes that these sensational charges are untrue and unsubstantiated? Are the packers to be indicted before the public upon groundless accusations? Are we to have a repetition of the aircraft "scandal" and the Hog Island "scandal"?

The public has no way of judging as to the truth of these matters. It seems as if it might expect from the Government its careful judgment upon the charges, instead of having them flung about to inflame all the discontented and trouble making elements of the country.

* * * * * * * *

* * * Mr. Heney was employed by the commission to conduct the "investigation" of the packing industry brought by the commission, and it has not escaped public memory the manner in which he staged the hearing, following in the main the scenario of a moving-picture production—breaking into safes, rushing into court at all hours, seizing papers, and other spectacular stunts, with Mr. Heney always catching the spotlight.

When the preliminary report was published regarding the profits of the packing companies it was evident that the chief aim was to make political capital out of the whole proceedings. Figures under the adroit handling of a Heney can be made to tell anything.

This report is a political document to be used in the autumn campaign * * *

Seriously, is it not time to call a halt? Are we not hastening our course toward Bolshevism that laid Russia low and made it an easy prey to the enemy? * * *

[Chicago Evening Post, Chicago, Ill., Aug. 13, 1918.]

* * * Political and economic adventuring is dangerous enough in days of peace; it is lunacy at an hour of high crisis in the country's history.

* * * Francis J. Heney furnished the material upon which this report is based after a prolonged fishing expedition, improperly dignified as an investigation. Mr. Heney paraded his catch in the columns of the press, using the magnifying glass of his imagination to make minnows look like whales and sardines like sharks. * * *

Even were we to accept the construction placed upon facts and alleged facts by Mr. Heney, we would still find ourselves unable to agree with the conclusion reached by the commission. * * *

* * * * * * * *

On the other hand, it may be shown beyond question that the business of feeding our Army and Navy has been marvelously facilitated by the efficient methods of the packing industries. * * *

[Grand Forks Herald, Grand Forks, N. Dak., Aug. 9, 1918.]

* * * * * * * *

It is unfortunate, however, that the reports of the commission on some of these matters have not always been such as to inspire confidence or command respect. Some of its pronouncements in connection with the meat industry have been such as to cause distrust, because they have been rather in the nature of appeals to the emotions than sober statements of material facts which would aid to an intelligent understanding of the situation. * * *

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On this roll call 233 Members have answered. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors, and——

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. FERRIS. I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oklahoma moves that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

THE FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, a moment ago the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] presented to the House what to me was a very serious, a very strong, and, I think, too strong a castigation of the Federal Trade Commission. The substance of it was that a band of socialists, five or six in number, had prepared a report on the Beef Trust, every word of which was untrue. I do not know whether it was untrue or not, but——

Mr. MADDEN. I did not say that. I said the statement had nothing to do with the facts.

Mr. FERRIS. My contention is that there is nothing presented here to prove that the findings of the Federal Trade Commission were untrue.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. FERRIS. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to print in the RECORD, immediately following the gentleman's speech, the report of the Federal Trade Commission on this Beef Trust investigation so that the House and the country can take the gentleman's speech and the report of the Federal Trade Commission and read them and analyze the two together.

Mr. GILLETT. How long is it?

Mr. FERRIS. I have not gone into it carefully enough to know.

Mr. GILLETT. I will object to it until I can ascertain how long it is.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Has it not already been printed?

Mr. FERRIS. I understand it is about 20 pages long.
Mr. GILLETT. I object.
Mr. FERRIS. I think it ought to be printed.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG].

WINNING THE WAR.

Mr. RODENBERG. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the one vital, overshadowing issue before the American people to-day is that of winning the war and winning it now. The consideration of all problems not directly or indirectly related to the one great, all-absorbing issue must and should be suspended for the time being. [Applause.] The heart and soul of every loyal American is to-day imbued with but a single thought and purpose, and that is the speedy and conclusive triumph of democracy over autocracy, of republicanism over militarism. [Applause.]

When, on that fateful day in April, 1917, the Congress of the United States, which, under the Constitution alone has the power to declare war, passed the resolution declaring that a state of war existed between the Government of the United States and the Imperial Government of Germany, then and there and at that very moment all argument as to whether or not we should have entered the war was forever closed, and every American worthy of the name adopted as his motto the motto of the immortal Decatur: "Our country! In her intercourse with foreign nations may she always be in the right; but our country, right or wrong!" Then and there and at that very moment it became the patriotic duty of every citizen, without regard to creed, color, or nationality, to give wholehearted and undivided support to his Government in the prosecution of the war. No matter how great the cost, no matter how terrible the sacrifice, no matter how stupendous the task, our one and only concern at this time should be the welfare and the protection of the gallant young heroes who, on the bloody fields of France, are fighting for the honor and integrity of the American flag, the symbol of liberty, justice, and humanity wherever it is unfurled to the breeze. [Applause.] This is the platform on which I stand and on which I shall continue to stand so long as my country is at war. It is the platform on which every true American stands to-day.

In a Republic like ours, the Government must of necessity be administered by and through political parties; but, thank God, the patriotism of America is not confined to any single political party. [Applause.] No one political organization in this land of the free has a monopoly on loyalty. To the everlasting glory of our citizenship, be it said, that in this great conflict in which our country is now engaged those of us who are politically opposed to the present administration have responded loyally and cheerfully to every demand made upon us by the Nation's necessities. In this great crisis Republicans in and out of Congress have been guided by the highest standards of genuine Americanism and have ungrudgingly supported every measure which those in authority have recommended as necessary for the success of American arms and American valor. This is as it should be for this, after all, is the only true test of national patriotism. The loyalty of no man is to be determined by his eagerness to plunge his country into war, but rather by the manner and spirit in which he supports the Government when his country is at war. [Applause.] Nor is his loyalty to be determined by subservient acquiescence in every whim and caprice of an administration which, unfortunately, has never yet overlooked a single partisan advantage. In helping to make the world safe for democracy it is in no sense a reflection upon the loyalty of the citizen if, at the same time, he declines to help make this country safe for the Democratic Party. [Applause.] Constructive criticism has always been the handmaid of real efficiency and is welcomed by every honest man. Incompetency alone shrinks and cowers before publicity and takes refuge behind a camouflage of spurious patriotism when the searchlight of truth is turned upon it. [Applause.] If the time should ever come when dereliction of duty on the part of those high in authority and charged with solemn responsibilities, involving the very life and death of our sons and brothers, can not be fearlessly and frankly criticized without subjecting the critic to the charge of disloyalty, then, indeed, may we despair of the future of the Republic. The American people, however, are intensely jealous of their inalienable, constitutional right of free speech, and they have sufficient intelligence to differentiate between criticism of a partisan administration and criticism of the Government itself. And it is to some of the grossly partisan acts of a partisan administration that I shall address myself for a few minutes to-day.

Shortly after the close of the recent senatorial campaign in Wisconsin, which resulted so disastrously to the administration's candidate, Mr. Davies, and in which the Democratic Vice President brought his great office into public contempt by brazenly and brutally insulting the patriotism of every Republican in that great Republican State, President Wilson addressed a joint session of the House and Senate. In the course of that address which, for beauty of diction and redundancy of rhetoric, was more or less of a literary masterpiece, the President, in urging immediate action on a new revenue bill, told us, among other things, that "politics is adjourned." When he gave utterance to that expression I happened to be looking toward this part of the Hall in which the members of the Cabinet were seated and I thought I detected the suspicion of a smile on the benign and beatific countenance of our amiable, nonpartisan Postmaster General, the Hon. Albert Sidney Burleson. [Laughter and applause.] And, if I mistake not, I also saw the heir apparent, the Hon. William Gibbs McAdoo, whose thoughts are always foreign to every consideration of practical politics, nod his head in silent approval of the presidential statement.

But the President did not smile or give any outward manifestation that he was not entirely serious, although the mind of every Senator and Representative who heard him instinctively reverted to the intensely partisan letter which he addressed a few weeks before to the Democratic candidate for Senator in Wisconsin and in which he sought by implication to discredit the loyalty of one of the bravest, one of the truest, and one of the most patriotic Americans who ever occupied a seat in this Chamber, the Hon. IRVINE L. LENROOT. [Applause.]

Politics is adjourned! Indeed! How very, very interesting. Why, my friends, since 12 o'clock noon on the 4th day of March, 1913, politics in this country has not been adjourned for a single, solitary minute. It has not even been held in abeyance. It permeates the very atmosphere. It surrounds us on all sides. It controls every official act and every official appointment. It is found in every branch of the public service. It lurks in the corners of every Government building. It makes daily trips to the golf links and accompanies the President to the vaudeville on Monday, to the drama on Tuesday, to the comic opera on Wednesday, and to the movies on Thursday. Like Banquo's ghost, it will not down, but is ever present morning, noon, and night.

Was politics adjourned when the President wrote a letter antagonistic to the candidacy of the very able and distinguished Representative from Texas, Mr. SLAYDEN, who has faithfully served his constituency with conspicuous ability for the past 22 years—a letter designed to promote the political aspirations of his opponent who, by a remarkable coincidence, happens to be the brother-in-law of the present nonpartisan Postmaster General? [Applause.]

Was politics adjourned when the President sent a telegram to Alabama intended to compass the defeat of our brilliant young colleague, Mr. HUDDLESTON, and which was answered by an indignant constituency in tones so clear, so full, and so convincing that "he who runs may read"?

Was politics adjourned when the President interfered in the senatorial primaries in Mississippi and requested the repudiation of the fiery and eloquent Senator from that State, Mr. VARDAMAN, and by his interference no doubt materially reduced the majority that was obtained by the gentleman who enjoys the respect and confidence of every Member of this House, Mr. HARRISON?

Was politics adjourned when the stamp of presidential approval was placed on the senatorial aspirations of his former appointee, Mr. Harris, in Georgia, in preference to the fearless and independent Senator from that State, Mr. HARDWICK, and our own interesting, versatile, and popular colleague, Mr. HOWARD?

Was politics adjourned when only a few days ago the iridescent and irrepressible Democratic Senator from Illinois was sent posthaste, whiskers, spats, rainbow vest, and all, to France on a most mysterious mission, which, of course, is to be capitalized later on in his campaign for reelection to the Senate of the United States?

And right here I wish to digress for a moment. I hold in my hand a copy of the Congressional Directory containing the autobiographies of the Members of the Sixty-fifth Congress. On page 21 I read as follows:

JAMES HAMILTON LEWIS, Democrat, of Chicago, was born in Virginia; is 48 years of age; reared and schooled in Georgia; attended the University of Virginia; went to the State of Washington and began the practice of law. * * * Was presented by the Northwestern Pacific Coast States as candidate for the Vice Presidency in the Democratic convention of 1900; joint author with Prof. A. H. Putney of Laws and Decisions upon Elections; also Lewis and Putney on Constitutions, Statutes, and their Construction.

From this biography, written by the Senator himself, and which must therefore be accepted as in every way authentic, it would appear that he was presented as a candidate for Vice President in the Democratic convention of 1900, or 18 years ago. Inasmuch as the Senator is only 48 years of age, it is apparent that he was a candidate for Vice President at the age of 30. The Constitution of the United States in fixing the qualifications of the President and Vice President provides that these officials must have attained the age of 35. [Laughter.] It would seem to me that a joint author of a work on constitutions and their construction should have held his vice presidential aspirations in check at least until he had reached the constitutional age of eligibility. [Laughter and applause.]

I have here also the complete Biographical Congressional Directory published in 1913, at a time when the Senate was not yet electrified and illuminated by the effervescing effulgence of the senior Senator from Illinois. On page 807 I read as follows:

LEWIS, JAMES HAMILTON, a Representative from Washington; born in Danville, Va., May 18, 1868; moved with his parents to Augusta, Ga., in 1866; attended Houghton College and the University of Virginia; studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1882—

And so forth.

While this biography adds two years to the Senator's age, it will be noted that his precocity was so remarkable that, though the year of his birth is given as 1868, he moved with his parents to Georgia in 1866, or two years before he was born [laughter], probably to show them the way. [Laughter.] It will also be noted that his precocity increased with the years, for, according to this biography, he was admitted to the practice of law in 1882, or at the age of 14 years. It seems to me that in these days of lurking submarine dangers and floating mines and long-distance guns it is unfair to the people of my State and to the country itself to subject one so young, so unsuspecting, and so precocious, and who has contributed so much to the gayety of nations, to the hazards of an overseas voyage. [Laughter.] I am indeed surprised at the thoughtlessness of the President.

Mr. THOMAS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RODENBERG. I can not yield. Was politics adjourned when President Wilson selected the multimillionaire, Henry Ford, as his candidate for Senator in Michigan and notified all Democratic aspirants to "keep off the grass"? True, the great jitney builder, prior to the declaration of war, was "in no way a supporter of the administration," to use an expression that is rapidly becoming stereotyped, but when "politics is adjourned" many strange and remarkable things are apt to happen. It must not be forgotten, however, that it was Henry Ford who conceived the fantastic project of sending a shipload of impractical visionaries across the seas to take the boys out of the trenches before Christmas. It was Henry Ford who said that no man is patriotic and that the word "patriotism" is the last resort of a scoundrel. It was Henry Ford who, less than four months ago, declared:

"I don't believe in the flag; it is only something to rally around; when the war is over those flags shall come down, never to go up again."

It was the money of Henry Ford that paid for the highly sensational, full-page advertisements that appeared in the metropolitan press before the declaration of war impugning the integrity of purpose of every man who did not subscribe to his ultrapacifist views. It was the influence of Henry Ford and his millions that secured exemption from military service for his son Edsel, who is of draft age and in the very prime of vigorous young physical manhood. [Applause.] And yet, despite all these facts and at a time when the "acid test" is being applied ruthlessly and indiscriminately to others, it is Henry Ford who to-day basks in the sunshine of presidential favor. It is he who, although less than 5 per cent fit by virtue of his intellectual equipment and experience in public affairs, has been stamped, tagged, and labeled by the President himself as 100 per cent available as a candidate for the Senate from the great Republican State of Michigan.

It is unnecessary for me to continue to pile up evidence to show that the expression "politics is adjourned" is a mere figment of the presidential imagination, an empty, meaningless phrase. It is unnecessary to refer to the President's activities in South Carolina which eliminated the brilliant and highly efficient chairman of the House Committee on Agriculture [Mr. LEVER] from the senatorial race in that State, and thereby made possible, but I hope not probable, the election of the notorious and malodorous Cole Blease to the seat once adorned by the great John C. Calhoun. It is unnecessary to refer to many other instances of presidential interference, past and present; but at this point, without any comment of my own, but simply to illustrate the difference in the theory of a patriotic writer and the practice of a domineering Executive, I wish to call attention to the following excerpt from a work entitled "Constitutional Government of the United States," published in 1908 and reprinted in 1911 and 1913, and of which Woodrow Wilson, then president of Princeton University and now President of the United States, is the author. On page 71 I read as follows:

There are illegitimate means by which the President may influence the action of Congress. He may bargain with Members not only with regard to appointments but also with regard to legislative measures. He may use his local patronage to assist Members to get or retain their seats. He may interpose his powerful influence, in one covert way or another, in contests for places in the Senate. He may also overbear Congress by arbitrary acts which ignore the laws or virtually override them. He may even substitute his own orders for acts of Congress which he wants but can not get. Such things are not only deeply immoral, they are destructive of the fundamental understandings of constitutional government, and, therefore, of constitutional government itself. They are sure, moreover, in a country of free public opinion, to bring their own punishment, to destroy both the fame and the power of the man who dares to practice them.

Oh, consistency, thou art a jewel, but thy name is not Woodrow Wilson! [Applause.]

Would to God that politics was in reality adjourned in this hour of the Nation's peril! Would to God that presidential practice and performance could be made to square with presidential promise and profession! I, for one, do not believe that this is the time for politics. It is not the time for party contentions and party divisions. Uncompromising and orthodox as I have always been in my allegiance to the Republican Party, I can truthfully say that since the day war was declared I have not knowingly or consciously cast a partisan vote, and I do not intend to do so while my country is at war. I believe that unity of action and harmony of purpose on the part of the electorate are absolutely essential to American success, and if that unity and harmony can only be secured and maintained by foregoing a heated and bitter political contest in the various congressional districts of the country, then I am unqualifiedly and unreservedly in favor of the elimination of the political campaign, let the results be what they may. In this hour of stress and strife and sorrow and suffering I am more deeply and more vitally concerned about my country's welfare than I am about my own political fortunes.

Ah, my friends, those of us who draw our inspiration of patriotism from the life and teachings of the Godlike Lincoln are more than willing to have the "acid test" applied to us. The record is made, and that record speaks for itself. It gives to the Republicans in Congress a much cleaner bill of patriotism in upholding the President on every important war measure than is held by the members of his own political party. That record proves conclusively that it is to the Republican Party, which was conceived in a spirit of liberty and dedicated to the proposition of universal equality, that the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy is compelled to turn whenever a great emergency confronts the country. It is the one and only political party that has always rung true and that has never failed, and never will fail, to place patriotism above partisanship.

I impugn neither the motives nor the loyalty of any Member of this Chamber. But in the light of the history of the past, in the light of the character of the presidential campaign of two years ago, I can not help wondering just what would have been the measure of support accorded to the administration on the part of the Democratic membership of this House if Charles Evans Hughes were to-day President of the United States and our country was at war. I can not help wondering just what would have been the individual attitude of certain vociferous, noncombatant patriots in this Chamber, the men who affect to believe that they and they alone are responsible for putting the "glow" in Old Glory, if a Republican President occupied the White House to-day. I recall that two decades ago William McKinley was our President and that our country was at that time at war with Spain. I recall, too, that when the bill providing for a bond issue of $600,000,000, to finance our war activities, came to a vote only six Democrats out of the entire Democratic membership voted in the affirmative, and their names are Cummings, Driggs, and McClellan, of New York; Fitzgerald, of Massachusetts; McAleer, of Pennsylvania; and dear old Gen. Joe Wheeler, of Alabama. Contrast that, if you please, with the action of the Republican membership of the present Congress on all the bills providing for bond issues made necessary by our war with the Imperial Government of Germany. The record will show that every one of these bills received the unanimous support of the Republican Members of this House.

I well remember, too, the bitter partisan attacks made in this Chamber in 1898 on the President of the United States. I remember how the gentle and beloved McKinley, whose every heartbeat was in sympathy with the downtrodden and the oppressed, was denounced as a tyrant, a despot, a despoiler of the liberties of his fellow man. I recall the unfounded, reckless, and sensational charges of official graft and corruption hurled at every member of the Cabinet, the outrageous and un-American appeal to passion and to prejudice. No opportunity was overlooked by the Democratic leaders of that day to gain a partisan advantage out of a war also waged for humanity, and which resulted in the liberation of the unhappy people of Cuba from the brutal yoke of Spanish oppression.

Will any Democrat to-day deny that in the campaign for the Presidency in 1916, more than two years after the beginning of the European war, the Democratic Party adopted as its slogan, "He kept us out of war"? Will anyone deny that it was on that paramount issue that the Democratic Party appealed to the country for the reelection of Woodrow Wilson? Do you remember the alliterative little "stickers" that were spread broadcast over the country and one of which was preserved and handed to me by a friend whose politics I shall not mention? It reads as follows: "Wilson's wisdom wins without war." Have you forgotten the lurid posters that were to be seen on every billboard in every doubtful State, and especially in those States in which women have the right of suffrage, depicting the awful horrors of war? I well remember the picture. It was a gruesome, heartrending scene, a scene of carnage and death—ruined homes and wasted fields, frenzied men, with dripping knives in clenched hands, faces distorted by passion and lust of blood; others lying on the ground, writhing in mortal agony, with great gaping wounds from which gushed forth the blood of life, and over in the lower right-hand corner an anxious mother, with two little children tugging at her skirts, pointing to the picture of Woodrow Wilson and exclaiming, "He protected me and mine." Have you forgotten the impassioned appeal of the President himself, made at Shadow Lawn on the very eve of the election and in which he solemnly warned the American people that if his opponent, Mr. Hughes, were elected our country would become involved in the great conflict that was destroying the very flower of the world's civilization? Have you forgotten these things? Some of you would no doubt like to forget them, and they should be forgotten in the interest of our country and our country's cause. I refer to them only to remind you that if, in view of what you said and did in 1916, you should attempt in the year 1918 to make political capital out of the war and to appropriate the American flag as the personal property of the Democratic Party you will make the discovery that you have wholly underestimated the discriminating intelligence of the American voter. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The contest for supremacy in the Sixty-sixth Congress must be waged on higher and broader lines. It is not now a question as to what may have been your views two years ago nor what may have been your individual opinion as to a proper governmental policy prior to the declaration of war. The fearful fact remains and confronts us that our country is now at war with a foreign power, and that war must and will be fought to a victorious conclusion. [Applause.] We must banish forever all thought of "peace without victory" and never again entertain the miserable delusion that the American people are "to proud to fight."

The bugle has sounded. The call to arms has gone forth. The young men of America, animated by the spirit that comes to them from the inspiring memories of Lexington and Bunker Hill, of Monterey and Chapultepec, of Gettysburg and Missionary Ridge, of Santiago and Manila Bay, are marching forth to the strains of martial music, ready and willing to do or to die. [Applause.] The mothers of America, God bless them, brave of heart and smiling through their tears, are kissing their soldier sons good-bye, perhaps forever. With an abiding faith in the justice of our cause, with full confidence in our country's glorious mission, no sacrifice can be too great, no burden too heavy, no hardship too severe, when borne by us to help the boys who are fighting "over there" that an enduring peace may be the heritage of the children of the world. [Applause.]

From the depths of every loyal heart, and with all the fervor that exalts and glorifies every patriotic soul, there is echoed to-day throughout the Nation, united in thought and purpose and consecrated to the sacred cause of civilization, this one sentiment:

"Here's to the blue of the wind-swept North
When they meet on the fields of France.
May the spirit of Grant be with them all
As the sons of the North advance!

Here's to the gray of the sun-kissed South
When they meet on the fields of France.
May the spirit of Lee be with them all
As the sons of the South advance!

Here's to the blue and the gray as one,
When they meet on the fields of France.
May the Spirit of God be over them all
As the sons of the Flag advance!"

[Loud applause.]

INTERNATIONAL LEAGUE TO SECURE PEACE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] for 20 minutes.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend and revise his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I intend to address my remarks to the subject of an international league to secure peace. I delivered an address on this very subject on the 11th day of January of this year. Last December I introduced a resolution asking that Congress should initiate the organization of an international league to secure peace. Nothing has been done by the Committee on Foreign Affairs with the resolution. It sleeps a quiet sleep. The Committee on Foreign Affairs seems to be working, or rather not working, under the impression that the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House is a nominal committee, without any functions, without any real duties, and that whatever the parliaments of other countries may do the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives has nothing whatever to do with the subject of foreign relations. I expect, however, to reintroduce my resolution in a new form, asking that Congress should at least appoint a joint commission to make a study and inquiry into the problems connected with the subject of an international league to secure peace. I proceed upon the theory that the allied countries are not going to rest until Germany is defeated. [Applause.] I take it for granted that Germany is now defeated, because her entire foreign commerce has been destroyed, because she has been isolated from the rest of the world, and because she has arraigned against herself something like eight-tenths of the human race. But the mere military defeat of Germany would be a negative result. The allies are united to-day in a common hatred. Can they be united in a common love? Twenty-two or twenty-three nations find themselves to-day in a combination to defeat one military power.

This combination is not the result of any arrangement made prior to the war. Had there been an alliance of 23 nations, representing four-fifths of the population of the world and of the physical and material forces of the world in 1914, when Austria started the war by attacking Serbia, there would have been no war. Every reasonable man will be willing to concede that. Every one of the nations that is fighting Germany, with the exception of England, France, and Russia, entered the contest for its own reasons and at its own convenience. To what extent is there unity of policy among the allied nations? To what extent is there unity of purpose among the allied nations? To what extent is each of the nations now opposed to Germany willing to subordinate its own national aspirations and its own selfish desires to the welfare of humanity as a whole? To what extent do the respective national ambitions of the allies conflict, and, if so, can the conflict be removed? Shall the world, after Germany has been defeated, or shall the allies, after the central powers have been defeated, get to fighting among themselves as to the rearrangement of the world? Shall they continue competing with one another for foreign markets or for the acquisition of colonies or for trade concessions or for spheres of influence or for the control of maritime routes or railroads or for outlets to the sea? Shall tariff walls continue to divide them? What shall be done with the so-called semicivilized races? Shall there be rivalry for the privilege of exploiting the less-developed countries, or shall they be placed under the common protection of the civilized nations? And what is to be done with defeated Germany? Shall a new map be carved out by the sword, or shall certain fundamental principles justly applied to a concrete situation determine the basis of an enduring peace among the allies and between the allies and the central powers when the latter concede their defeat? Can the world disarm after the war, or shall armaments increase and militarism become a permanent institution throughout the world? These are some of the problems connected with the organization of a league to secure peace.

I do not believe in the slogan, "My country, right or wrong." It is a dangerous theory.

There is a nobler slogan, "My country must be right." And if I understand the spiritual aims of this war, and if I properly understand the message that President Wilson is trying to convey to the liberal and democratic elements of the world, it is that America is in this war as an agent of humanity and as a servant of humanity, and not to promote any selfish purposes of its own. "The world is to be made a safe place to live in." "It is to be made safe for democracy." Are these slogans mere catchwords, mere beautiful phrases to ensnare the unwary, or have they a meaning? If they do have a meaning, why should not the Congress of the United States immediately take up the question of organizing a permanent league to secure peace to the world after the war is concluded? Why not lay the foundation for it now? Why not at least inquire into the subject? We need men who will take up this problem. How can we talk about democracy in international relations when the very Members of Congress who have declared war refuse to consider any suggestion to study the international situation? How can we talk of democracy in international relations when everything is left to one man? How can we lead the fate of the world to one intellect?

I ask that Congress take up the study of this problem. I ask that Congress put itself in communication with the parliamentary representatives of the allied countries, that they meet in international conference. Only then will we give life to the principle that there should be democracy in international relations.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. I will.

Mr. DENISON. Is it the idea of the gentleman from New York that this movement ought to be started and carried on among the allied nations or the representatives of the allied nations?

Mr. LONDON. Well, this movement has been really started. The labor elements of Great Britain—and they are the most important social and political element in Great Britain—have continuously demanded the organization of a league for a durable peace. The independent socialists of Germany insist that the peace which is to come is to make the recurrence of war impossible by the creation of a supernational authority. So does the French socialist movement. Last August, as the gentleman will remember, there came to this Congress from the French Chamber of Deputies the chairman of the committee on foreign affairs of that body, inviting the Congress of the United States to join an interallied conference of the allied parliaments. On the 4th of August of last year, and before the visit of our French guests, I introduced a resolution to that effect. Only a few days ago I read of Lord Cecil suggesting that if an international league is to be formed it must be formed on a basis of a supernational patriotism. We here are backward. The Federal council of the Swiss confederation has organized a committee to study this very problem.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. I was going to ask the gentleman from New York if he did not think, if the plan should be formulated and to any extent matured by representatives of the allied nations while the conflict is still in progress, that that very fact would prevent or would tend to prevent the central powers from participating in it or joining in it?

Mr. LONDON. I would organize such a conference of the allied parliaments now.

Mr. REAVIS. The gentleman made reference to the chairman of the committee on foreign relations of the Chamber of Deputies in France. Within the last three or four weeks some 12 or 14 Members of this House were given a luncheon by Monsieur Bouillon, of the Chamber of Deputies, and in an address at that luncheon he made the statement that with the position the United States now occupies in the minds of European nations, if there were affirmative action on the part of the Congress of the United States it would give an impetus to that movement that would mean its manifest success.

Mr. LONDON. Exactly. Every thinking man throughout the world believes so. We suffer too much from the theory that in times of war all the affairs of the country should be handled and all of the thinking of the country should be done by one man.

Now, while I am a Socialist, I do believe that, so far as the executive part of the Government is concerned, so far as the duty of carrying out the laws is concerned, the more concentration the better. But to concentrate all the thinking in one man means the very death of democracy, and for that matter the very death of all civilized life. I would like to see Members of our Congress begin to cooperate with the members of the parliamentary bodies of other countries. Every government has an official press. We do not know what the truth is. We do not know what the facts are. Our newspapers unfortunately are not a reservoir of truth, and it all depends on who owns the pen of the editor who scribbles and who advises Congress what to do. And their impudence has no bounds. Some of them support the "National Obscurity League." [Laughter.] It has probably a larger percentage of profiteers than any other organization in the world, and this "National Obscurity League" has the arrogance to declare that only 47 out of 435 Members of the American Congress are 100 per cent loyal. It seems to have examined the record of votes of 347 Members. I suppose that is the kind of information that Bernstorff was furnishing his Government with.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Is it not a further fact that in the records of the National Security League the men who are unfortunately absent—and I will use that word advisedly—and not in attendance at the sessions of the House are put down as voting right, and they are given 100 per cent, whether they voted or not?

Mr. LONDON. It is not a calamity to be denounced by the National Security League. [Laughter.] Every self-respecting Representative should rejoice at being repudiated by that crowd. It is not a misfortune to anybody.

But I have digressed from my subject. We should draw a distinction between executive work and the work of shaping broad and deep policies. Let us be honest about it. You know the facts respecting our entry into the war. Our entry into the war was not the result of a definite and mature policy covering a period of years. We drifted into it. We were not ready for war at the time. Very likely if our Atlantic coast had been supplying the allied powers with munitions of war and the Pacific coast had been supplying the central powers with munitions we would not have been at war, because the business world was neither pro-German nor pro-English. In fact, the business world was ready to supply hell itself with fire and brimstone if hell were an accessible customer. [Laughter.]

Our right to freedom of the seas having been brutally disregarded, we entered the struggle.

I say we have drifted into this war. Having drifted into this war, shall we drift on? Should we not rather give shape and permanence to our policies? And then, gentlemen, do not make this mistake: Somehow people assume that there is great wisdom on top. It is a mistake. There is very little of it. I am not referring to the President in this particular instance, because I regard him more highly than any living man in American political life. I have no higher regard for any living man, and I regard hopefully the fact that the radical and liberal elements of Europe respect him and respect his views and take seriously the things he advocates as slogans for the termination of the war. I am glad to see that. But you must not assume that over there on top, the various cabinets that rule the world to-day, are pure reservoirs of wisdom.

A few days ago I read that Lloyd-George had said in Parliament that before the war England had promised France to supply her with eight divisions against Germany in case France were attacked. When I read that I thought what a bunch of incompetents they were in expecting that eight divisions would be much of a force against Germany. Just think of it! Eight divisions, which, according to the English rule, means in the aggregate 104,000 effectives, in order to help France fight Germany! What an ignorance it displayed of the power of Germany! What a failure to appreciate the fact that Germany occupied a compact and contiguous territory of a homogeneous population, with all her railroads constructed with strategic purposes in view, enabling her to transport hundreds of thousand of men from one front to the other in less than 24 hours. How little they knew the country which was permeated with military ideals. What a failure to understand conditions! What a failure to understand the enemy they had to contend with! And this was not the only blunder made by the allies. There are very few of the old statesmen to whom we can intrust the conclusion of this war on a basis which will guarantee to the world a lasting and durable peace. All the genuinely democratic elements in the allied countries would welcome with joy our effort to prepare the groundwork for a permanent union of the nations.

I take the position that a Member of Congress is an important man, in spite of the fact that he has to go to his constituents and ask every individual to vote for him—a disgusting proceeding. [Laughter.] He is the man who has the power to declare war, to send millions of his fellow countrymen into carnage and to death. He should have the courage to take a hand in shaping the foreign policies of his country. [Applause.]

A UNITED COUNTRY.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, my socialistic friend [Mr. LONDON] has given us some food for reflection, and his amendment to the doctrine that the country must be right meets with favorable consideration; but who is to decide? Are we to set our judgment up against the wish of the Government after the Government has decided upon a course of action? I agree to the doctrine, "My country, right or wrong." I agree that the country must be right, and I agree that when the country decides a question, as it has upon this question of war, no individual has the right to set his own personal judgment against the judgment of his Government.

Mr. Speaker, when I asked permission yesterday to proceed for 15 minutes here upon the theory that a "united country added to the military strength of the nation" I did not know that there was on the way a message from Gen. Pershing which seemed to give me a text for the theme which I had already selected. A dispatch from Gen. Pershing, printed this morning, says:

> It is the consciousness that the soldier has behind him an undivided Nation which enables him, whatever his rank, to face his task with courage.

It is for that undivided Nation that I plead to-day.

Mr. Speaker, our first great duty is to win the war, and I speak to-day in protest against those gentlemen who seek to make political profit out of our unhappy condition. The profiteer is a man who makes unreasonable profits in dealing with his Government. The man who takes from his Government in stress of war an unreasonable profit is a profiteer and an undesirable citizen, and under our ethics the man who seeks to make political profit out of the blood of our sons is in the same class. I purpose to show in the brief time I have to-day that the Democratic leaders have, since the very day of the inception of this war, "capitalized" the war for the purpose of political gain. In other words, in the stress of war, while fighting for success, they have sought to make two by-products—one, the permanent establishment of the Democratic Party in the United States; and, second, the absolute destruction of the party of Abraham Lincoln.

When war was declared every man who voted against the declaration of war surrendered his personal opinions and stood ready to make every sacrifice for the success of our arms. We had wiped out the middle aisle that separated the Republicans and Democrats and vied with each other to see who could render the best service in our preparation. Inside of 30 days after the declaration of war, Mr. Sulloway, a Republican of New Hampshire, died and there was no occasion to seek to elect a Democrat in his place. The party in power had a working majority in the House, and everyone of us was satisfied with the distinguished and patriotic services of the Speaker of the House. Notwithstanding that fact the RECORD shows that the Democratic leader in the Senate went to New Hampshire and declared that a vote for a Republican was a vote for the Kaiser. This unkind statement was made at a time when there could be no occasion for it except to humiliate Republicans and increase the Democratic majority in the House of Representatives. Of course the people in New Hampshire resented it and returned a Republican in place of Mr. Sulloway. I did not believe that that conduct met the approval of the President of the United States until subsequent conduct of the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy is conclusive that he intended that his party should profit in the by-products of war; for, inside of 60 days thereafter, a Republican who had been elected in Indiana answered the last roll call, and that State was to furnish a man in his place. The same condition existed as existed in New Hampshire. There was no need, for war purposes, to increase the Democratic majority of the House, yet the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy became so anxious to have a Democrat to succeed the Republican who died that he wrote a personal letter that was sent to every voter in the district and displayed in large headlines in the newspapers, asking for the defeat of the Republican whose loyalty had never been questioned and the election of a Democrat. That letter is dated June 19, 1917, when we were trying to organize an army and build airplanes to defend our boys. I will not quote the letter in full; it can be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 29, 1917. The President put away his sword long enough to write in his letter for the Hon. Finly H. Gray, "It would afford me the greatest satisfaction to see him returned to the House of Representatives." Can you imagine a more deliberate attempt to utilize, capitalize, and profiteer politically out of the by-products of the war? I have never criticized any military act of our Commander in Chief and certainly will not during this war, but I respectfully protest against the great power he has now being used for political purposes.

An examination of the speech of our colleague, Mr. WOOD of Indiana, shows that Mr. Gray opposed, when he was in the Sixty-fourth Congress, the enlargement of the Army and Navy, that he voted against the volunteer-army plan recommended by the President, and the speeches of Mr. Gray quoted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 29, 1917, show that, notwithstanding the existence of war abroad, he was "opposed to any military plans for this Nation calling for vast expenditures of money."

People of the sixth district of Indiana resented this military interference and elected a Republican, our colleague, Mr. ELLIOTT, who has industriously given his whole strength for legislation in the interest of the successful carrying on of the war. I may be permitted to say, in passing, he was elected by a larger majority than his predecessor had in the fall election.

The next election was in Wisconsin, where a United States Senator was to be elected. It is fresh in the minds of the people. I call attention to it for the purpose of respectfully protesting and also to warn that great body that believe in the economic and political principles of the Republican Party, that an effort is being made to drive them, either by false patriotism or fear, out of their party into the party of the President of the United States. There is no more reason to change our party to please the President than there is to join some particular church because he belongs to it. It will be remembered that Mr. LENROOT, one of our distinguished leaders, was nominated by the Republicans of Wisconsin, and notwithstanding the fact that he had voted for the declaration of war as recommended by the President and had voted for every proposition asked for by the Executive, yet the President of the United States once more unsheathed his sword and with that brilliant literary art with which he is gifted he attempted to brand LENROOT with that peculiar "acid test" of disloyalty. It is no wonder that the bright and shining Democratic lights of Wisconsin, getting the inspiration of the President's letter against LENROOT and seeking to capitalize and make use of this by-product of the war, saw, or thought they saw, a chance to get the soldier vote of Wisconsin. Many of these boys were in Camp Grant, Ill., being taught obedience to their superior officers, and this is the advertisement that appeared in the Democratic paper at Rockford, where Camp Grant is located:

> Tuesday, April 2. To the Wisconsin soldiers at Camp Grant: You are entitled to vote for United States Senator from Wisconsin to succeed Senator Paul O. Husting. President Wilson, your Commander in Chief, desires all loyal Americans to vote for Joseph E. Davies for United States Senator. Davies's election means joy at Washington and gloom at Berlin. Davies's defeat means gloom at Washington and joy at Berlin.

I call this advertisement an infamous thing. It not only shows a desperate attempt of the Democratic leaders to use the war forces for political profit, but it is humiliating and disgusting to every American citizen who believes in the separation of the military from the civil power of the Government. It states that the election of a Republican was in the interest of Germany and would bring joy to Berlin, whereas the man who really brings aid to the Kaiser is the man who falsely states to the world that the Republican Party, the party of Lincoln, is friendly to our enemy in time of war. Of course Wisconsin resented it, and I had hoped that the President of the United States and the leaders of that party found this by-product of war was not such a valuable asset as they imagined and would desist in such use of it as Democratic aid. It seems that they have not profited by their experience—New Hampshire, Indiana, or Wisconsin—and once again, while the airplane inspector in Chicago was robbing the Government and using in the most wicked way his appointing power to assist favorites to escape the draft, our Commander in Chief hears with alarm that my distinguished friend, Senator LEWIS, of Illinois, is about to retire to private life, and once again he turns his eyes away from the airplane and Hog Island, and once again his face from the western front, and takes his pen in hand to implore the Democratic leader from Illinois not to dream of resting under his "vine and fig tree," but to go forth with his spear and shield of the Democratic Party in order that the "real issue" may be made plain in the State of Illinois.

The Democratic committee of our State caught the voice of their leader and immediately called a meeting of the State committee and issued the most thrilling screed of patriotism that it has ever been my pleasure to read. It is long and wide, transparent and not deep. When analyzed it is this: First, the President wants LEWIS for Senator from Illinois; second, anyone who opposes the President's wish in Illinois politics is a traitor; third, a vote against LEWIS is a vote against the President; therefore, with logic as clear as mud, a vote against Senator LEWIS is a vote for the Kaiser. This is what the Republicans of Illinois have to contend with, and I resent the statement made by the State committee as an insult to every intelligent elector in the State, and in my humble opinion it will be resented by men of all parties at the polls in November.

I have not time or space to call attention to the President's suggestion that they nominate a man already named by the Democrats for Senator from Michigan. I have the highest respect for Mr. Ford. I am not one of those who sneer at his honest effort to bring about peace. I respect him and honor him for it. He is not seeking the Senatorship, apparently, and the presidential interference in his behalf is uncalled for, to say the least, and is part and parcel of that political "generosity" displayed in Minnesota, where the Democrats declined to run anyone against my old friend and colleague, Senator NELSON, which the Republicans have generously answered that in return we will not run anyone in Georgia, Mississippi, Alabama, or adjoining territory.

The whole plan of the Democratic Party is to put the stain of disloyalty upon every Republican likely to be nominated, and certain organizations, leagues, and societies that were formed originally in the high thought of the good of this Government are being commercialized and used in the interests of candidates before primaries in both parties. It is being aided by many good people who have been misinformed as to the attitude of the Republican Members and Senators; it is being aided by some who imagine they have an absolute monopoly on patriotism and loyalty; it is being aided by some who, lacking physical and moral courage, will employ scandal mongers to assassinate character; and I believe it will become the duty of the Congress of the United States in the interests of the success of this war to investigate the German propaganda they are now putting out to the effect that thousands of our Americans are disloyal. Yet, Mr. Speaker, in the language of TOM WILLIAMS, our Illinois colleague from Egypt, "It is no new sensation for a Republican to be loyal." No Republican ever fired on the American flag. Our Democratic brethren, in the dark days of sixty-four, declared in a convention that the war for the preservation of the Union was a failure and demanded an immediate cessation of hostilities. If any party was to do that now they would get punishment that they justly deserve. In the Spanish War, when we did not know the attitude of all of the nations of the world toward us when we declared war against Spain, my distinguished friend, the Senator from Illinois, had the honor of being a Member of this body as a Representative from the State of Washington, and voted against a bond issue of only six hundred millions, and not only did he vote against it, but when, under the direction of President McKinley, the revenue bill was pending, which the Senator voted against, he took the floor in opposition to the measure. His voice to-day is constantly "Stand by the President," and we agree with him when it refers to matters of winning the war. But then, when President McKinley wanted money to win the war, the Senator said:

I have listened too often, Mr. Speaker, to the constant cry of "patriotism" as the reason for legislating measure after measure here, and only the other day we heard from our honorable friends on the other side that patriotism should always drive us into the line of action which shall execute the desire of the other side, irrespective of any virtue or vice of the measure.

On this side of the House there arises, now and then, as did my friend from New York, the distinguished and honorable gentleman, Amos Cummings, who advised this assembly that he "put his country above party," and under that cry certain gentlemen on the floor, under his leadership, calling themselves Democrats, found it agreeable to support the measure mortgaging the generation and their children yet unborn, irrespective of the fundamental justice of it. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, legislative day, May 3, 1898.)

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, consider if $600,000,000 at the beginning of the war was a mortgage upon our children for generations yet unborn, irrespective of the "fundamental justice of it," what should we say as to the billions and billions of dollars we voted for in this war and not a single Senator or Representative, either Republican or Democratic, has lifted his voice against or cast a single vote against the bonds or appropriations asked for by the President of the United States? It seems what is a virtue in a Democrat becomes a vice in a Republican. In the vote against the declaration of war we were about evenly divided, as I now recall it.

Our distinguished Speaker, as I remember, made a very eloquent speech against conscription.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. For volunteers, not against conscription.

Mr. MASON. For volunteers, yes; and it was the best speech on that side, unless mine on the same side might have been. [Laughter.] They have not prosecuted him or persecuted him. He was immediately thereafter offered a Democratic Senatorship, and has been renominated, as he ought to be, and will be reelected. Our distinguished Democratic leader [Mr. KITCHIN], who voted against war and made one of the most splendid speeches I ever heard—no one has ever heard of his being persecuted for that vote; and I say again, is it fair in this campaign to make what is a virtue on that side of the Chamber a vice on this side?

Everyone who voted against war has voted for every man and every dollar asked for. We have tried to show the world and our enemies a united country, and any man who seeks to make political capital or dig up a thing that happened before the declaration of war for the purpose of disturbing the forces of this country is doing it for some selfish purpose and injuring the cause for which we are fighting.

If a Republican calls attention to Hog Island it is an unpardonable offense. If one-half of the money we have appropriated had been honestly used to build airplanes, such as were being built in Italy, France, and Great Britain, the Hindenburg line would have been moved ere this to the River Rhine. In modern warfare airplanes are the eyes of the Army. When a Republican mentions this fact it becomes treason or sedition. But when a Democrat has the courage to mention it, it is called "constructive criticism."

Mr. Speaker, I briefly call attention to the disposition of the party in power to its political illusions at the expense of the Government. It will be remembered in our first revenue bill we put an increase of 10 per cent on import duties. The brilliant and distinguished leader of the Democratic Party in this House, whom it is an honor to know, saw that it was impinging somewhat upon Democratic principles, but patriotically put his country above his party and adopted that policy. Word came from higher up that it might protect some American industries, and notwithstanding the fact that the bill was a revenue bill and we needed the revenue, yet that provision which would have produced us $3,000,000, approximately, or $600,000,000 under a Republican tariff bill, was stricken out, and the millions of dollars worth of silks and other luxuries came in under the low tariff, and we have levied upon the little children who patronize the moving pictures. A tariff for revenue has been one of the principles always claimed by our Democratic brethren, and in this hour of stress when revenue is so much needed the party in power continues to operate under the low tariff as in times of peace, rather than add anything that would look like giving a substantial protective tariff. Every one of our allies has a larger per capita import tax than we have. England has $10.25 per capita; we have $1.68—bringing approximately $168,000,000. The Payne-Aldrich schedule would bring $600,000,000, and the English schedule would bring $1,127,000,000, or nearly a billion more than we get now.

Has the soft pedal been put on the campaign song of a "Tariff for revenue," for fear the incidental protection might become the real thing? In times of war prepare for peace.

I ask you frankly, is that politics or patriotism? Again, was it politics or patriotism that refused to accept the offered volunteered services of the four divisions of over 100,000 men above the age of 27 who were ready to go to France on a moments notice? Gentlemen have not forgotten the record. The conscription act was passed by this body leaving out those four divisions. The Senate heard from the people, and Clemenceau, the great Frenchman, begged that Roosevelt be sent. Roosevelt did not ask to command a division, and when the conscription act came back to this House the four divisions were in, and the roll call was had and it became a part of the law. It was passed by the House and Senate, and the President signed the bill. It was openly stated here on the floor of the House that the President would nullify that act by refusing the volunteers, notwithstanding section 6, which "authorized" him to accept the volunteers in the same legislative language as the other section which "authorized" him to raise an army by conscription. Is it any wonder that when we are told that he kept us out of war that we answer that the only man he kept out of war was Theodore Roosevelt? [Laughter.]

Under the Constitution of the United States the Congress is authorized to make rules for the government of our Army and Navy; yet no one of us at either end of the Capitol dare raise the inquiry, In what cantonment we are now using the military knowledge and skill of Leonard Wood?

Mr. Speaker, I have said that I would never make anything like a political speech during this war, but I see the party intrusted in the last election with the government of this country neglecting the business of the Government in order to place the stain of sedition upon the Republican Party. I am bound by a sense of duty which I can not resist to resent it. One gentleman running for Congress on the Democratic ticket makes this statement:

The Republican Party is and has been spreading the propaganda of the German Kaiser. The Republican leaders have their hands stained with the blood of their countrymen and are spreading propaganda of the Kaiser.

If this sort of rot is what we Republicans have to contend with the sooner we know it the better. Who helps the Kaiser? Who gives encouragement to our enemies while our boys are fighting "over there" and all of our women, Democratic and Republican alike, are knitting and praying for the success of our arms? Who is sowing the seeds of discord and trying to make political profit out of the blood of our sons? The men who are saying to the world "that great body of citizens organized in the Republican Party are in sympathy with those vampires who seek to dominate the world."

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MASON. I will ask for five minutes more of the indulgence of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MASON. In this last conscription act which we passed we differed on one point as to the age of the conscripts, but the House did not divide on party lines, and when the bill came for final passage there was not three votes against it. And yet statements like that simply say to our enemy, "Fight on and hold the lines until the Republican Party comes into power; then you can treat with them, for they will betray their country." That is not the message Pershing asks for. No Republican has ever voted against any bill on its final passage for raising men and money to prosecute this war. Four men have resigned their seats in Congress to fight the battles of their country, and every one of them was a Republican. We love our great Republican Party and its traditions. We respect you for your devotion to the party of your principles, but we deny that you have any monopoly on patriotism, and you should not seek to destroy the reputation of Republicans simply to appeal to the passion or the prejudice of the people, when you should be giving all of your time to the prosecution of this war. You say we will not swap horses crossing a stream. It is not trading horses to climb off a bow-legged donkey onto a healthy elephant.

If the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of last Thursday, showing the wicked and corrupt management of our airplane department, made under the present administration, reported by a Democratic committee, and published to the world, could be printed in Germany, it would give more comfort and add more to the morale of the broken German Army than the winning of a German victory. The following is from the report of the Senate Military Committee:

On July 24, 1917, Congress appropriated $640,000,000 to carry out the aircraft program. This fund has been, either by actual expenditure or by commitments, exhausted. * * * We have not a single American-made chasse (or plane of attack) upon the battle front. We have not a single American-made bombing plane upon the battle front. We have not developed or put in quantity production a successful chasse or fighting plane. * * * As early as the month of October, 1917, we were in possession of the necessary facilities to construct the Caproni, a powerful and successful heavy bombing plane, approved both by the Italian and English aeronautical engineers. Expert Italian engineers have been upon the ground since the month of January, yet the fact remains that we have up to date constructed only one experimental machine which is equipped with Liberty motors. Nearly a year has elapsed since we might have begun work upon these machines and by this time have been in quantity production.

The report of the inspection department, which has been published, shows not only the wanton and woeful robbing of the Government of the United States, thereby aiding the enemy, but it was used as a cloak under which the friends of those appointed by this administration could creep by the score to escape military service. I did not write this report, and I have no desire to use it in a political campaign, but I give you notice now that the wickedness which deprives our boys on the battle front of the protection which the American people have paid for can not be covered up by the false, wicked statement that the Republicans are spreading German propaganda.

See what our soldier boys are doing. The world's history has never recorded greater military skill and bravery than is being written day by day on the western front. If we had spent one-half of the money that has been squandered or stolen to build the airplanes already approved by Italy, France, and Great Britain, we would have 10,000 in the sky above our boys on the western front and driving the enemy back to the River Rhine before the close of this campaign. There is no place hot enough for the American who would line his pockets and put out the eyes of the American Army; and next to the man who robs our Government at this time is the man who seeks political power either for himself or his party by appealing to the prejudice and credulity of our fellow citizens. The Republican Party has made no attack upon the loyalty of the Democrats in this House. We know you are loyal. You will be tried in the districts of this country where two men are running for Congress not upon the question of your loyalty but upon the question of your efficiency and the honesty of the man appointed to discharge governmental duties, and the sooner you abandon the doctrine of a monopoly on patriotism, the sooner you quit calling everybody a traitor who does not vote the Democratic ticket, the sooner you realize that your boy and my boy are over there fighting together for our flag, the sooner you realize that it is not a question of who shall be elected to Congress but a question of who can do the most efficient work to aid the glory and prestige of the American arms, the sooner you do these things the sooner the prospects of the Democratic Party will brighten. The paramount issue will be, Who can furnish the best skill and brain to win this war? And upon that issue we will go to trial with you in November and let the American people decide.

I plead for neither your party nor mine, but for our country's sake. Quit giving out false statements as to the loyalty of Republicans. Let us go into the field and on the hustings, say to the world that though we differ on great economic questions, questions of military policy, we are one on winning the war. Let us make every political meeting a patriotic meeting. Let us see who can sell the most liberty bonds. Let us see who can do most for the noble Red Cross, the Young Men's Christian Association, the Knights of Columbus, and the Salvation Army. Let us quit calling every American with a foreign name a traitor. A united country strengthens our military arm. The morale of the German Army is gone because the German people have lost faith in their cause. Our boys are fighting; my God, how bravely they fight! The blood of age rushes like the blood of youth through my veins when I hear of their bravery. Let no civilian hurt them by the slanderous statement that one-half of our people are not with them. It is not true; it is a lie, a damnable lie.

Mr. Speaker, your boy and mine are fighting side by side. Let us, you and I, do the same. Let all political parties do the same. This, sir, will be notice to the Imperial Government of Germany—to the Kaiser himself—that, no matter what the political vote in November, the unanimous vote of America sustains the prestige of American arms. That Americans on the field are united, and about the firesides of our homes we are not divided. [Applause.]

THE INDEPENDENCE OF IRELAND.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for about five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the entrance of our country into the terrible struggle now raging in Europe, and the many reasons given for our entering the contest, has brought hope to the people in many of the smaller countries of the world, to none more than to the people of Ireland. I will endeavor to be brief and to take up but a few minutes of your time for the purpose of calling your attention to a petition that I have been requested to present to Congress by a committee of ladies, who were here in Washington a short time ago representing the Mothers' Mission, a body of some 75,000 women, many of whom were born in Ireland, and the balance of Irish extraction. My purpose is to call the attention of the President and Congress to the petition, which contains the signatures of over 600.000 men of the Irish race in the United States, who love liberty and believe in making this world a decent place to live in.

The petition and the drafting of same is the result of the action of a convention of American citizens of Irish blood, held in the city of New York, on the 18th and 19th of May last, asking "That you take such action as in your best judgment will secure for Ireland the same rights accorded to all the other small nations." The delegates to this convention were from every section of the United States, who now have many thousands of near relatives serving this Republic in the Army and Navy fighting for liberty and the rights of small nations.

I will take up your time for a minute longer to read the heading of the petition, which is quite short:

PETITION TO THE PRESIDENT AND CONGRESS FOR THE INDEPENDENCE OF IRELAND.

We, as American citizens, respectfully state to the Government of the United States that Ireland is a distinct nation, deprived of her liberty by force and held in subjection by England by military power alone. As America has entered the war for the preservation of democracy and the freedom of small nationalities, this Government is in honor bound to apply this principle impartially in all cases of peoples held in subjection, whether they be under the jurisdiction of Germany, like Belgium, or of England, like Ireland. As America can not be a party to any scheme of world-peace which withholds from any nation the God-given right of freedom, the only final settlement must be the complete independence of Ireland.

America has the right, by her entry into the war, to demand it from England, not in the peace conference at the close of the war but now.

We therefore respectfully urge upon the President and the Congress the necessity and good policy of giving a great example to the world by insisting that England shall grant Ireland complete national independence. We earnestly hope that, like Cuba, Ireland will be made free by the action of America.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the petition, with the signatures, be given its proper reference.

The SPEAKER. It will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. WALSH. The 600,000 names certainly are not going to be printed.

Mr. GALLAGHER. No; nothing will be printed except what I have read. But I have here a letter from the Mothers' Mission, addressed to the President of the United States, that I would like to have published in the RECORD in connection with these remarks, calling his attention to this petition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

CHICAGO, ILL., July 9, 1918.

Hon. WOODROW WILSON,
President of the United States of America,
Washington, D. C.

YOUR EXCELLENCY: A convention of American citizens of Irish blood was held in New York City on the 18th and 19th of May for the purpose of drafting a petition to your honored self and to the members of the Congress, asking that you take such action as in your best judgment will secure to Ireland the same rights accorded to all the other small nations.

The delegates to this convention were men and women representing large bodies of citizens in every section of the United States who have many thousands of near relatives serving this Republic in the Army and Navy.

Among the women delegates were many mothers of sons now among America's fighting forces in France, and many more who have sons in the training camps here ready and eager to join the forces abroad for the purpose of defending with their lives American ideals.

A number of these mothers were born in Ireland, and the balance are of Irish extraction. Naturally they are interested in the fate of unhappy Ireland and the recent events over there have rendered them very uneasy. They say that their boys, too, are uneasy, not knowing what may be happening to their kin in the cradle land of the race. Many of these mothers feel that if they could get an interview with you, Mr. President, and in that interview present Ireland's case in the name of their boys for your consideration that you would take up the cause of the Irish people in Ireland and see that they also are included among the peoples for whom you so nobly advocate the right of self-determination. These mothers have cheerfully given their boys for the sacred cause of American freedom as well as the cause of the oppressed races of the earth, and they are positive that even though you have never mentioned Ireland in your public declarations on behalf of these oppressed races nevertheless they can depend on you to see that no injustice is done to Ireland at the peace conference, because she happens to be held in bondage by one of our cobelligerents.

After discussing matters of this nature these mothers petitioned the writer to organize what they were pleased to term a "Mothers' Mission to the President and the Congress of the United States," who would proceed to Washington and lay their troubles at the feet of you, the Chief Executive. I was not chosen as organizer of this mission because I had sons with our fighting forces in France. Almighty God did not bless me with sons. I have, however, three nephews wearing Uncle Sam's khaki, two of them now in France. I have eight other nephews who will be called later on; I have several young cousins in the ranks, and I have a son-in-law whom I love as much as if he were my own flesh and blood who expects to join his country's colors sometime the present month.

I was chosen because of the fact that I am the national president of the ladies auxiliary to the Ancient Order of Hibernians, an organization composed of 75,000 American women of Irish blood, thousands of whom are the mothers of sons already enrolled in America's Army of democracy. Many of these sons are to-day in France and constitute a large part of that Army.

I have written to your secretary, Mr. Tumulty, asking that he arrange for this interview. I am informed by him that, owing to the great demands upon your time it will be impossible for you to arrange a date to receive the Mothers' Mission just now. Mr. Tumulty kindly suggests that I place in the form of a memorandum the matters which we wish to lay before you; he promises to bring same to your attention at the earliest possible moment, and in this communication I am complying with Mr. Tumulty's suggestion.

We have no desire, Mr. President, to add to your already heavy burden of care nor do we wish to embarrass you in any way, but things are transpiring every day which are tending to make matters so grave for us that we feel we can not keep silent any longer. Speaking from my own knowledge and for the Irish in America as I have come in contact with them, I have this to say: My official duties have taken me into 30 States of the Union since Good Friday, 1917. I have addressed gatherings of my people in many towns in these States; I have met with them afterwards in groups and singly and have listened to their conversations, and can truthfully state, Mr. President, that they are backing America to win, win against the whole world if necessary, and they are giving very substantial testimony of this, both in man power and worldly means.

When Gen. Washington raised the flag of a new Republic on this continent 142 years ago, Irishmen and the sons of Irishmen rallied to his standard in amazingly large numbers; in every crisis that threatened the life of the Republic from that time to the present Irishmen have no cause to hang their heads in shame because of the part they played. In the days of stress and trial for the young Republic the Irish in Ireland nobly played the part of a friend in need; they gave ample proof of this friendship many a time since when danger threatened America; in fact, the destinies of the two countries have always been enshrined as one in the hearts of Irishmen in America and in Ireland, and in the hearts of grateful Americans as well.

For 30 years the Irish members of the British House of Commons have been begging and pleading for even a small measure of home rule, but all to no purpose. You are no doubt familiar with the gallant action of the young Irish Democrats who raised the flag of a Republic in Ireland Easter week, in the year 1916. They had grown tired of promises that were never kept. The young men who sacrificed everything for liberty as being the one thing above all others that would bring happiness and contentment to their unhappy land, paid the penalty which many lovers of freedom have had to pay, but the cause of the Irish Republic is alive to-day, safely enshrined in the hearts of tht great majority of the Irish in Ireland. All this led to the firm stand taken that Ireland would give no more men to the English Army until England conceded to Ireland the right she is apparently willing to concede to Poland and the other small nations.

After the terrible series of tragedies following Easter week, 1916, England made a show of trying to settle the Irish question by means of a hand-picked convention. This convention remained in session nearly one year and adjourned without accepted results. A few days later, like a thunderbolt out of a clear sky, came the news that England had voted to conscript the Irishmen in Ireland.

True, Americans were conscripted, but it was by vote of their duly elected representatives who had the vested right to make whatever laws they deemed necessary for the safety of the Nation. Canadians were also conscripted, by their own vote. In Australia conscription was defeated on referendum to the people. Ireland alone was denied the right to say what should or should not be done with her own men.

When the smoke of battle has lifted and men will be able to think clearly again and dispassionately and without prejudice, we wonder how will this act of England appear; we wonder what impression will be made on the American mind by this picture of England voting to conscription against its will, the remnant of Irish manhood which remains in the island.

In the House of Commons, June 25, Mr. Lloyd-George admitted that England is governing Ireland without the consent of its people. Notwithstanding this, Lord French, the military governor of Ireland, said on the same day that he would enforce conscription "unflinchingly and in the face of whatever opposition, whether criticism or actual force, may be attempted."

Up to the passing of the conscription act in Ireland the Irish people in America were seemingly a part in the drama, but not of it. We watched with pride the brave struggle our people were making against the power and force of a mighty nation. We could not well understand how statesmen on each side of the Atlantic were willing to accord independence to the Poles and the Bohemians and to all other oppressed races and deny the same right to the Irish. The passing of the conscription act, however, brought the trouble into our very midst. Should the British Government persist in enforcing it against the wishes of the overwhelming majority of the Irish people, a crime may be enacted which will cry to heaven for vengeance.

Whether by accident or otherwise, a portion of the American press has lent itself to a campaign which is tending to place not only the Irish in Ireland, but the Irish in America, in a false light before the American public—in fact, the position of the Irish in America, because of this press propaganda, is daily growing more and more intolerable. These papers take no account of the fact that to give in man power proportionately according to population to that which Ireland has already given, America will have to place 5,500,000 of her sons under arms and transport them to the battle front in France.

England could settle the Irish difficulty with one stroke of the pen, if she wished to settle it according to the American standard. To the average person the matter seems very simple; the majority of the Irish want the right to govern themselves. The minority do not want to accord them this right. The minority have had their way for several centuries, and it would seem but fair and just to give the majority their turn now.

On the 22d day of May the English prime minister announced that he had proof that the Irish in Ireland were plotting for another rebellion. Immediately about 100 Irish men and women were arrested and deported to England and thrown into prison for the ostensible purpose of preventing this rebellion. Now, Mr. President, the people in Ireland know and have declared that no such rebellion was ever intended, and no proof has been given to the contrary. What they do declare, and what the world knows, is that the people were taking radical steps to resist conscription by every means in their power, and one of the chief reasons for the arrests was to remove those whose leadership and support were to be relied on most in meeting the criminal menace to the liberties of the Irish people. There has been no attempt to bring those arrested to trial and to give them a chance to defend themselves. The British Government gives lame excuses for its failure in this respect, but continues to make vague charges, which are poisoning the minds of Americans against Ireland. If fresh proof of conspiracy existed last month, the then Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Lord Wimborne, and his staff, would have been cognizant of it, but he has definitely and publicly stated that they had none. In view of this and the statements of the Irish people themselves, those of us in America who decided to take the word of our kinsmen rather than that of the British prime minister are amply justified.

Justice demands that a man be held innocent until he is proven guilty before a jury of his peers, but this brand of justice seems to be missing in the characters of many of our foreign correspondents and in a considerable section of the American press. In their minds no proof of the accusations against the Irish people is necessary. If Mr. Lloyd-George makes them, that is sufficient, and so the poison that is endangering the peace of many of our communities is being persistently distilled through the columns of our daily papers.

In seeking justice and fair play for our kin in Ireland we feel that we deserve recognition at the hands of our fellow American citizens. contribution to American greatness. We only ask an examination of what we are doing to-day. We think it will be found that, according to our numbers, we are contributing as much man power, and perhaps more, than are any of the other races which go to make up America's population. The boys we have given have come from good, clean stock; they have been reared in simple, wholesome surroundings, and have There is no need of going back to past history for proof of the Irish been trained according to our good, old-fashioned ideals, which means they have known the proper discipline in the homes. Hence, I venture to say that they are not giving their commanding officers much trouble either in the camps or in the trenches. The daily casualty lists are plentifully interspersed with the names of these boys who have already sanctified the cause of American freedom with their lives. I know personally of several homes where sadness reigns to-day because a brave boy will never return, but there is no repining in these homes; rather, you will find that America has become all the more dear to them because of the brave young life given for its cause. We are not seeking to minimize the sacrifices which those not of our own blood are making, but we feel a just resentment because of these prejudices which have arisen against us, as we know that we are not deserving them in the least.

We have no one to go to with our troubles, Mr. President, but you, Mission humbly solicit your friendly interest in our present perplexities, our beloved Commander in Chief, hence the members of the Mothers' The mothers ask this friendly interest from you in the name of the boys they have willingly given to you to help you vindicate the principles of democracy—principles of which they know you are the greatest living exponent.

And, Mr. President, the Mothers' Mission have commissioned me to ask you, in their name and in the name of their boys, to be Ireland's friend at the peace conference. With Irish optimism we are not looking at the present carnage but to the horizon where we see the dawn of a glorious peace with victory and honor. Emblazoned in letters of gold we see in that glorious dawn "America's Army victorious!"

You have given every evidence of splendid statesmanship; by your lofty ideals, so in keeping with America's noble history, you have induced many of the European countries who are engaged in this struggle on our side to assume a less vindictive and mercenary attitude. You have endeavored to keep our beloved country on the very highest pinnacle of nobility of soul by your oft-repeated assertions that America wants no material gain in this contest, that we desire only to help make the world a better place in which to live. Naturally you will be the biggest factor in this peace conference, and may Almighty God preserve you in health and wisdom for that happy day.

In conclusion, Mr. President, just about the time this document reaches your secretary, Mr. Tumulty, a committee from the Mothers' Mission will present to the Congress petitions signed by over one-half million American citizens, claiming that "As America can not be a party to any scheme of world peace which withholds from any nation the God-given right of freedom, the only final settlement must be the complete independence of Ireland." We are satisfied that nothing less will satisfy the aspirations of the Irish people; that without complete national independence the Irish question will continue to disturb the peace of the world. England herself now admits that the settlement of the problem is a most important and necessary item toward the winning of the war. Therefore we pray you, our Chief Executive, to demand of England immediate justice for Ireland!

We hope you will pardon this long letter, but you seem near and dear to us, and so, Irishlike, we have "made our own of you." We know that your life to-day is not a bed of roses; we know that you have great trials to overcome, and we are constantly praying that our Heavenly Father will spare you to the sacred cause for which we are all fighting, and you may rest assured that the members of the Mothers' Mission will aid you in every possible way—even if it entails the giving of our very lives.

MARY F. MCWHORTER,
On behalf of the Mothers' Mission.
MRS. WILLIAM MCWHORTER,
1021 East Forty-sixth Street, Chicago, Ill.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. SIMS. Reserving the right to object, let me say that there is no man in the House that I should rather accommodate at this time than the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FOCHT. Now is the time to do it.

Mr. SIMS. Two months ago to-morrow the water-power bill was reported and has been on the calendar ever since, and I have been trying to get it considered.

Mr. FOCHT. I am willing to sit here right along until it is through with.

Mr. SIMS. Then if consent is given to the gentleman from Pennsylvania some one else will want five minutes, and so it will go.

Mr. FOCHT. I have really an important matter I wish to call to the attention of the country and the House.

Mr. SIMS. What is it?

Mr. FOCHT. If the gentleman will give me 10 minutes I will try to make clear to him what it is.

Mr. SIMS. Is it a matter of politics?

Mr. FOCHT. No; no politics in it. I would not discuss politics here and at this time. I will refer to an economic question of vital importance.

Mr. SIMS. I will not object, Mr. Speaker, but I give notice that I shall object to any further requests.

Mr. FOCHT. That is all right about any further requests. [Laughter.] Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the House and the country, and I must do it hurriedly, to some facts I have gathered from an investigation as to the result of the notice that has been given by a branch of the War Industries Board having control, or which undertakes to regulate, the consumption of news-print paper. There are several points I wish to allude to, and as I shall not have time to conclude I ask unanimous consent now to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD should I so desire.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. This is not to contain any new or extraneous matter?

Mr. FOCHT. No; nothing extraneous but absolutely on this subject.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOCHT. It is to be undertaken by this board to have the country newspapers—I believe it applies to all newspapers, but I am speaking particularly for the country newspaper on account of the inevitable ruin to be wrought. They are the papers that have a particular form, using a four-page or an eight-page, and the board undertakes to say that publishers must reduce their paper consumption 15 per cent. Also that the newspapers will not be allowed to make a contract with subscribers—that is to say, you must collect your subscriptions within three or six months after the subscription expires. These are the two points uppermost in mind at present: Reducing the consumption of print paper and compelling publishers to drop from their lists all subscribers who do not make cash renewals within three months after the expiration of their subscriptions. It is self-evident that whoever conceived this plan of curtailing news-print consumption is not familiar with either the cause of the shortage of news print or the management of a country weekly newspaper. For the shortage there is a ready remedy, while the dropping of subscribers is as hopelessly impracticable as it is unjust, while it would put out of business half of the country weeklies and hamper and hinder the rest.

Our first suggestion is to stop right here in Washington the reckless waste by the newly created departments, where extravagance in the use of paper paid for by the Government is a common scandal. Instead of spending large sums for an army of clerks and inspectors to apply the crude remedy proposed upon country editors, those in charge of the War Industries Board could get better results and save twice the 15 per cent if they would at least start the curtailment in the departments in Washington. In an address before the House on June 28 I pointed out specifically where there was gross wastefulness in the use of paper and how it might be remedied. I wish to now read into the RECORD a letter received from a gentleman well known and of high repute, who in his county has charge of the sale of war-savings stamps. This is what he says:

PORT ROYAL, PA., July 9, 1918.

Hon. BENJAMIN K. FOCHT,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I read your remarks in which you referred to a recent visit to one of the chairman of war-savings-stamps campaign and was not long in coming to a conclusion as to whom you referred to.

You know we have about 15,000 people in our county. To be exact, we do not have quite that many, and I put in my requisition for supplies. I told them that I would need only 4,000 cards to notify those registered in our county of the meetings at the schoolhouse, and they sent me 50,000. (Sample inclosed.)

I received 50,000 pledge cards for the drive. That gave me three cards and 5,000 over for every man, woman, and child in our county. I have 60 per cent left and do not know what to do with them.

Of the large lithographs, etc., which are only good for the drive on June 28, I had 1,000 left over after billing the county all over, and the committee men I know had a lot left over. All this wastefulness makes me sick at heart, since the people are doing everything they can to save and save and buy bonds and war stamps. I really do not know what to do with this lot of circulars they are sending me, and I am told by other county chairmen that they have been likewise loaded up.

Very truly, yours,

WILLIAM HERTZLER.

I have had a Member of this House tell me of a like experience and that the bank of which he is president is jammed with literature which can not possibly be used. My further remedy is not to spend vast sums harrassing country editors who are already sufficiently disgusted with the Postmaster General's freakish zone system as applied to country papers, to save the 15 per cent, but to increase production by restoring to the country the news-print paper mills which have been closed in the United States and driven to Canada on account of short-sighted tariff adjustment. At present we are wholly at the mercy of Canada for print paper and must pay any price asked. The consequence of this has been the ruin of hundreds of newspaper enterprises and the necessity of nearly all the rest endeavoring to survive by increasing the subscription price. Here is a fine example of where the news-print paper manufacturer of Canada profiteers by milking the public through the helpless American publisher. Therefore either increased production or economical use of paper by the departments in Washington will meet every requirement without any interference on the part of the War Industries Board with the business of publishers who weekly in the aggregate use thousands of columns of copy without cost to the Government in booming liberty bonds, war-savings stamps, and the Red Cross. To attempt to force the discontinuance of subscriptions which are not paid in three months is the limit of oppression and interference with the right of contract. If this principle of business were carried out in every branch of industry or trade, the country would go plumb to smash the first hour it is tried. With from 90 to 95 per cent of the business of the country being done on credit the folly of this proposal is plainly apparent. With as much justice and common sense might this branch of the war board, desiring something to occupy its time, notify the Palais Royal, or Kahn's, or John Wanamaker that your wife or mine might not be allowed a credit of one or two dollars for a longer period than three months. It is all too preposterous for further discussion, and to save the newspapers of the country from ruin, and for the good of the Nation, I hope this division of the War Industries Board may devote their energies toward closing the wasteful leak here in Washington and assisting in restoring by wise tariff legislation the great news-print mills which have been driven from the country by experimental and unwise legislation.

EXTRACTING GREASE FROM GARBAGE.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a letter which I received from Col. Kennon, at Camp Greene, with reference to extracting grease from liquid garbage. It is a very interesting process, and I think the country should have information in respect to it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, who is the author of the letter?

Mr. WEBB. Col. Kenuon, at Camp Greene. I think it is a process which should be put into operation at every camp.

Mr. WALSH. How long a letter is it?

Mr. WEBB. It is just a page and a half.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE WATER-POWER BILL.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the water-power bill.

MISSION FROM URUGUAY.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, before the Chair puts the motion, the mission from the Republic of Uruguay is here, comprising Dr. Baltasar Brum, minister for foreign affairs of Uruguay; Dr. Cesar Miranda, vice president of the House of Representatives; Dr. Xavier Mendivil, senator; Dr. Asdrubal Delgado, financial delegate of the executive power; Dr. Justo Jose Mendosa, secretary to the minister of foreign affairs; and Lieut. Canosa, aid-de-camp to the minister. These distinguished gentlemen are at present in the gallery of the House, and I ask unanimous consent that the House stand in recess for 15 minutes so that they may be invited to the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the House stand in recess for 15 minutes.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, before that request is put, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present, and I do that because I think we should have a full representation of the House here to welcome these distinguished guests.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The SPEAKER. On this roll 225 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move that we dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the House stand in recess for 15 minutes, in order that we may receive the mission from Uruguay. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Chair appointed the following committee to conduct the distinguished guests to the floor of the House: Mr. FLOOD, Mr. STEDMAN, Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi, Mr. PORTER, and Mr. MILLER of Minnesota.

Accordingly, at 3 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m., the House stood in recess.

At 3 o'clock and 46 minutes the mission, accompanied by Mr. Jordan Herbert Stabler, Chief of the Latin-American Division, State Department, and Mr. Hugo D'Pena, chargé d'affaires, Uruguay Legation, and escorted by the committee appointed, entered the Hall of the House.

The distinguished visitors were escorted to the Speaker's rostrum amidst long applause and cheers.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, it has been the policy of the United States from the beginning to cultivate the friendliest relations possible with our sister Republics to the south of us. All together on this continent are 21 republics. The Republic of Uruguay has sent a mission here, headed by its minister of foreign affairs, Dr. Brum, whom I now introduce to you. [Applause.]

Dr. BRUM. Señor Presidente, Señores Legisladores: En nombre mío y en el de mis compañeros, agradezco intensamente este homenaje que tributáis a mi patria y a su Gobierno, El Uruguay ha alcanzado un notable desarrollo en su organización institucional y ha tenido en vista siempre el ejemplo del Congreso Americano, dictando leyes democráticas y justas por esto nos llena de gratitud esta demostración de simpatía que nos hace la más prestigiosa asamblea republicana en la sede de sus deliberaciones que es mirada por el mundo como el templo de la democracia de donde surgen las leyes más sabias para organizar la sociedad y para garantir los derechos de los hombres.

Si en cualquier momento esta recepción nos habría honrado y conmovido es lo cierto que ahora la impresión es más honda porque aquélla se produce en el instante mismo en que vuestro patriotismo, vuestra inteligencia y vuestro tiempo están consagrados a la obra magnífica de vencer para siempre al imperialismo agresivo y despótico. [Aplausos.]

Señores Legisladores: Formulo los más íntimos votos porque los Estados Unidos de América, vuestra poderosa e inteligente cooperación, impongan al mundo el reinado de la justicia entre los hombres y del derecho de todos los pueblos a gobernarse a sí mismo. [Aplausos.]

[Translation.]

Dr. BRUM. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House of Representatives: In my name and in that of my companions I wish to express my intensely grateful acknowledgment of the homage paid by you to my country and its Government. Uruguay has achieved a notable development in its institutional organization and has always kept in view the example of the American Congress in enacting democratic and just laws. Therefore we are filled with gratitude at this manifestation of sympathy extended to us by the most republican assembly at the seat of its deliberations, which the world looks upon as a temple of democracy where the wisest laws for the organization of society and the protection of man's rights are given birth.

While this reception would have given us honor and emotion at any time, the impression is assuredly more profound now because of its being made at the very moment when your patriotic intelligence and time are devoted to the magnificent undertaking of conquering forever an aggressive and despotic imperialism. [Applause.]

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, I make the most earnest wishes that the United States of America, through your powerful and intelligent cooperation, may impose on the world the kingdom of peace among men and the right of all the peoples to govern themselves. [Applause.]

The members of the mission then took their places at the right of the Speaker's rostrum, and the Members of the House were presented to them. The distinguished visitors were then escorted from the Hall of the House.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. When the recess was taken the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] had moved to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the water-power bill.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, it is now 4 o'clock, and I do not think it would be possible to keep a quorum here and to commence a large bill like this after 4 o'clock on a hot, oppressive day. I do not think it a wise thing to do, and therefore I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Speaker, before that is done I desire to present a request for unanimous consent at this time. I ask permission to address the House to-morrow morning after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of the usual business on the Speaker's table for 30 minutes on the question of whether politics is adjourned.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that to-morrow after the reading of the Journal and the cleaning up of business on the Speaker's table that he be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes on the question of whether politics is adjourned.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, could not the gentleman make his address this afternoon? The water-power bill ought to have consideration by the House and not be held up by the revenue bill. Let the gentleman make his request for permission to address the House this afternoon.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman withdraw his motion to adjourn?

Mr. SIMS. I will withdraw the request and take up the bill if there is going to be time used to-morrow, but let the gentleman submit his request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has submitted his request.

Mr. SIMS. But it has not been acted on.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows it has not been; it has not been put.

Mr. SIMS. If it is granted, then I will move to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on the bill to-day.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I hope nobody will object to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, we have been trying to get this water-power bill up for consideration for some days, and while I do not want to prevent any gentleman from making a reply to the speech of Mr. RODENBERG, or any other speech, I am not willing that the water-power bill to-morrow shall be displaced by a speech or preceded by a speech, and I shall object to a speech being made to-morrow.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, could not we obviate this matter if the gentleman from Tennessee ask that when the House adjourns to-day that we meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow? The gentleman from Pennsylvania could take 30 minutes, and possibly we will be able to start on the bill before 12 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will make one remark. His observation of this 11 o'clock business is that invariably, nearly, somebody raises the point of no quorum and we waste 30 minutes on a roll call. Why not resolve the House into the Committee of the Whole House now and let the gentleman make his speech?

Mr. SIMS. That is the motion I was going to make—that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the water-power bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the water-power bill.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. WALSH) there were—ayes 71, noes 2.

WATER-POWER LEGISLATION.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 1419, with Mr. WEBB in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 1419, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 1419) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a commission is hereby created and established, to be known as the Federal Power Commission (hereinafter referred to as the commission), which shall be composed of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of Agriculture. Two members of the commission shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, and the commission shall have an official seal, which shall be judicially noticed. The President shall designate the chairman of the commission.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] asked for recognition.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent now that I may be permitted to proceed for 30 minutes out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for 30 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I recognize at once my inability to cope in any way either with the eloquence or, perhaps, with the great temerity that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG] exhibited in his address to the House only a short time ago. I recognize, too, that there is in this House, and has been ever since I have been here, a certain rule of precedence which gives to older Members and those who are more accustomed to the ways and procedure in the House an undoubted right to express their views on almost any question without interference, and that young Members are usually relegated to the rear and are supposed to keep silence, even upon very important questions. But, in my judgment, the time has come now when a Democrat from the greatest Republican State in the Union, with the exception of one, should voice his sentiments in protest against the utterances made by the gentleman from Illinois. [Applause.]

His conduct upon this occasion, as compared with his past record, reminds me of a little distich that I heard many years ago, a corruption of the stanza in an old hymn, which runs something like this:

Whilst the light holds out to burn,
The vilest sinner may return.
Whilst there's grace enough to save us,
Still there's hope for Charley Davis.

When I look at the record that the gentleman from Illinois has made for himself upon the different war measures as presented in this Congress and in the last Congress, I am somewhat astonished that he should, in the opening of his remarks to this august body, have said that since the declaration of war he had always supported the administration and had been for every measure which was called up by the administration in the prosecution of the war. Usually people judge others not so much by the sound of their voice or by the utterances that they make as by their acts, and, if this judgment is to be taken, then I would refer to this assembly what the record of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG] shows.

I have in my hand a tabulated statement, a record of votes, and the first that I find upon that record is a bill to provide revenue to defray the war expenses, and for other purposes. An amendment was offered that a tax of 5 per cent should not be collected on automobile manufacturers until they shall have earned a profit of 8 per cent upon actual capital invested. Mr. RODENBERG voted "yea," as did 147 Republicans and 26 Democrats; and on the passage of the bill Mr. RODENBERG voted "nay," as did 76 Republicans and no Democrats. It therefore appears from that record as established that Mr. RODENBERG, of Illinois, voted against the revenue measure for the prosecution of the war.

I also find upon that record "a resolution declaring that a state of war exists between the Imperial German Government and the Government and the people of the United States and making a provision to prosecute the same." When the roll call was ordered there were yeas 373, and there were nays 50. And I find to my utter surprise and somewhat, possibly, to the surprise of this House, that this gentleman who was condemning the President of the United States for taking care of the interests of the Nation in its time of peril was one of the 50 who voted against the declaration of war, although he is now proclaiming his patriotism as beyond all question.

Perhaps it might be informing at this time to refer to the fact, and I do it in no invidious way, but refer to it merely as a fact which seems to be established beyond the peradventure of a doubt, that the people of the district from which this speaker comes repudiated such action, and if the truth be entirely known, or if public prints are to be believed, they not only repudiated that action but they actually besmirched him by holding him up to public ridicule and hanging him in effigy.

I find also a bill "to punish acts of interference with foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, and for other purposes," and in looking at that I find that Mr. RODENBERG voted "yea," as did 146 Republicans and 38 Democrats. When there was a roll call there were yeas 260, and nays 106, and Mr. RODENBERG voted "yea," but 97 Republicans and 3 Democrats voted "no." I find, also, a record of the gentleman's vote in regard to another matter which was of supreme importance. The Committee on Rules reported a rule making in order a resolution requesting the President to warn Americans against traveling on American ships of any kind. On the previous question being called on the rule, the roll was called and there were yeas 256, and noes 160. Mr. RODENBERG of Illinois voted "no," as did 138 Republicans and 32 Democrats.

And yet after that record, as it is established in this House, the eloquent gentleman from Illinois has the temerity to come here on this day, without a word of warning to anyone of his purpose, and condemn, if you please, the patriotic acts of the President of the United States in demanding the defeat of the McLemore resolution. And in spite of the fact that he says that from the time of the declaration of war he was supporting the President of the United States I find the damning record here that he voted against the interests of the American people and attempted to keep them from the privilege of traveling upon the high seas in the common pathways of commerce.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. I can not at this time. Immediately after I have practically concluded I will.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will ask the gentleman the date the McLemore resolution was up in the House.

Mr. DEWALT. I have not the date.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It was a year before war was declared.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. RODENBERG voted "no" on the tabling of the McLemore resolution.

I find, too, that in regard to a bill to tax incomes, corporations, munition manufactures, and other products, and for other purposes to carry on the war, on a motion to recommit the bill to the committee with instructions to amend so as to raise an equitable proportion of the required revenue by a protective tariff, a point of order was made against the motion and sustained by the Speaker and an appeal was made from that decision of the Chair and a motion made to lay the appeal on the table, and Mr. RODENBERG voted "no," as did 191 Republicans and no Democrats. A vote of "no" was equivalent to a vote of "yes" to recommit.

Now, my friends, the eloquent speaker from Illinois quoted a sentence in which he said that "patriotism was a mask behind which scoundrels hide," or words to that effect. During my short career in the House of Representatives I have heard many men declaim their patriotism. It has been a common practice here on both sides of this central aisle for men to proclaim in the highest terms their individual patriotism. I do not disagree with a sentiment of that kind, nor do I disagree with the gentleman from Illinois when he says now, that in spite of his past votes and past record, he is patriotic. I do not question that. But I do question the sincerity of the gentleman who by his past record has established that he was against the administration in the beginning of this war and in the prosecution thereof, as shown by the record, when he now condemns in part at least, or attempts to belittle, if you please, the acts of the executive officers of this great Nation.

Now, how does he propose to condemn them? But before I go to that I find also that in respect to a bill to provide increased revenue to defray the expenses of the increased appropriations for the Army and Navy and the extension of fortifications, and for other purposes, Mr. FORDNEY made a motion to recommit the bill to the committee, and I find on a record vote that Mr. RODENBERG voted "no," which was equivalent to a vote of "yes" to recommit, as did 195 Republicans and no Democrats.

I find also this significant fact in the record: With respect to a bill authorizing the President of the United States to supply merchant ships, the property of citizens of the United States and bearing American registry, with defensive arms, and for other purposes, Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin made a motion to recommit the bill with instructions to the committee to report it back with the following amendment:

Provided, That no ship of American registry armed in the manner aforesaid shall carry cargo consisting in whole or in part of arms or ammunition consigned to a belligerent country or to a citizen thereof.

And on it there were 125 yeas and 293 noes. Mr. RODENBERG voted "yes," as did 76 Republicans and 47 Democrats. On the passage of the bill, the roll call was—yeas 403, and noes 14.

After the other remarkable vote Mr. RODENBERG voted "yes." Eleven Republicans voted "no." In other words, my esteemed friend from Illinois voted for the Cooper amendment in this very shipping bill in regard to the arming of merchant ships of the United States; and it comes with poor grace, my friends, after this lapse of time, for one as distinguished as the gentleman from Illinois has the right to claim himself to be, to now, in unmeasured terms condemn and belittle and, if you please, worse than that, traduce the Chief Executive of this Nation.

Now, how does he propose to prove his case? After first uttering in these blatant terms, as I may call them, his patriotic sentiments, he then speaks of the necessity of political parties. No one will dissent from that position. As our Government is formed, we must have partisanship, if you please, and we must have political parties. The very foundation of our Government is established upon the keynote that there must be an honest diversity of opinion about the policy of the Government by the different parties thereof, and when that is once established and accepted, necessarily there are political parties. But there never should be an extreme of partisanship at any time, whether in peace or in war. But when I listened to the gentleman's speech, while I had the temporary honor of presiding over this House, I came to the conclusion that he not only had forgotten that there are not to be parties, but he has forgotten entirely the fact that he is a partisan and a partisan of the rankest sort.

I find, too, in the course of his remarks that he said that the President of the United States, immediately after 1918, had said that politics was to be adjourned, in part at least; that he then, at that time, decided that there should be no partisanship displayed in the disputation in Congress or in the general public at large.

Granted that be true, was it not the duty of the President of the United States, at any time and at all times whilst we were going in preparation for this titanic struggle, to attempt to get all parties, whether Democrats or Republicans or whatever their party appellations might have been, to join under one banner and to forget for the time being that there was a party distinction? And yet he says now that politics has not been adjourned. Why? Because the President of the United States has seen fit, as he calls it, to interfere in the election of Congressmen and Senators of the United States.

Now, let us see how that looks. I base my argument largely upon this proposition, that a good Republican is at any time a great deal better than a bad Democrat, and so I believe that inherently this follows, that a patriotic man in either House of Congress, whether in the Senate or the House of Representatives, if he be patriotic, whether he be a Republican or a Democrat, is to be preferred to anyone, whatever his politics may be, if he displays by his action unpatriotic sentiments or deeds. [Applause.] He referred specifically to the case of Senator VARDAMAN. I have no personal acquaintance with the gentleman. If my personal feelings were to be regarded and had I been a citizen of the great State of Mississippi, I should unhesitatingly cast my vote for the gentleman who is about to succeed him, the Hon. PAT HARRISON. [Applause.]

But be that as it may, the record establishes the fact that the gentleman from Mississippi who nows occupies the senatorial chair and wears the senatorial toga voted very much akin to and like the gentleman from Illinois, who now claims to be so patriotic. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the rules of the House are being transgressed by the reference of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the votes and acts of a United States Senator on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. DEWALT. I would not have had the temerity to refer to the matter at all had it not been called in question by the distinguished colleague of the gentleman from Kansas, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG]; but when the subject has been opened, and when it is made a cause of complaint against the President of the United States because he patriotically stands up and says boldly to the people of Mississippi that he is against the manner and the means and the methods of a candidate for United States Senator, I say he is performing a patriotic duty which is imposed upon him by the Constitution. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman tell us why the President of the United States opposed that great patriotic young American, IRVINE LENROOT, in Wisconsin?

Mr. DEWALT. I can not. I can not tell what his motives were. I only know this one fact, that the President of the United States did, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG] said, possibly promote the fact that the Vice President of the United States went to the State of Wisconsin and there made public speeches against Mr. LENROOT. I say frankly to this assemblage, because I desire to be honest and frank in all discussion, I have never for a moment questioned the loyalty of Mr. LENROOT, now Senator of the United States from that great State [applause], and I grant you, for the sake of the argument, that I believe oftentimes the Executive interference in matters of this kind is harmful instead of beneficial. [Applause.] But I take the broad ground, also, that where there is undoubted disloyalty exhibited by the actions of any man, whether his name be DEWALT or VARDAMAN or LENROOT, it becomes the bounden duty of the protector of the Constitution of the United States, to wit, the President of the United States—it becomes the duty of the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy to see that some record of that be made by him in saying that he believes that an individual has not acted loyally.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. In view of the President's "acid test" in Wisconsin, can the gentleman tell us why the President is now supporting Mr. Ford for Senator from Michigan?

Mr. DEWALT. I believe that the answer to that is this: Whatever may be said against Mr. Ford's past record in reference to his pacifist tendencies, I believe the record seems to show that Mr. Ford is a promoter of what he believes at this time to be loyal sentiments, and which are in reality loyal sentiments.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. He will not let his son fight.

Mr. DEWALT. Now, my dear sir, you are bringing the personal equation into the fight. What the reasons are, or what the local board's reasons are, for the excusing of Mr. Ford's son from this particular service, and giving him a deferred status, you and I can only judge by inference, and I never yet have convicted a man upon hearsay testimony, and you never did either, and never pleaded for it in a court of justice.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly.

Mr. KNUTSON. Would the gentleman uphold the President's interference in branding the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] as undesirable timber for membership in this House?

Mr. DEWALT. I know nothing of the record of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN], except what I have noticed here in the House. I do not know what his record is as to voting on different questions, but I say now, frankly and openly, that if my record discloses that by votes I have refused to recognize the necessities of this war, and that I have failed to support the administration in the measures asked for and demanded by it, then I am deserving of defeat, and deserving of condemnation, whether my name be SLAYDEN or whether it be DEWALT. That is the broad proposition.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman say who is to constitute the arbiter and judge and the court of honor by which the loyalty of citizens like ourselves is to be decided?

Mr. DEWALT. That is the easiest thing in the world.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Shall one man do it?

Mr. DEWALT. No.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. One man seems to try to do it.

Mr. DEWALT. That resolves itself into this finality, as the gentleman well knows: The people of the district in which the man lives will decide that question; and if the President of the United States falsely makes a charge against an individual, I premise as a fact to be established in the near future, perhaps, that they will repudiate any such charge.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Does the gentleman base that observation on the result of the recent election in a district in Alabama?

Mr. DEWALT. No; I do not. There were other circumstances which led to the result there, and the gentleman possibly knows what they were. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] comes from a highly congested district, a manufacturing district in Birmingham and a portion of the county outside of Birmingham. I understand, although I do not know it positively, that the liquor question came largely into the canvass, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] took the broad ground that these men were not to be deprived of what they had usually had in that regard, and the issue was made up in that way. I may be mistaken in that, as I am only repeating what I have heard.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Then John Barleycorn came to the rescue of the candidate, instead of the administration.

Mr. DEWALT. John Barleycorn has helped many men into difficulty and many men out of difficulty. [Laughter.] I hope the gentleman is not one of them.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. A few moments ago the gentleman stated that the President had a right to indorse certain candidates for the House and the Senate.

Mr. DEWALT. No; I did not state that.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I would like to call the gentleman's attention to a letter which the President sent to ex-Senator Chilton, of West Virginia, in which he said that he disliked to indorse the candidacy of any individual on the ground that what he might say would be resented, and rightly so, by the constituents in that district.

Mr. DEWALT. I saw that letter; that is what I am calling the attention of the House to. The gentleman asked me a few moments ago who was to be the final arbiter on the question, and I repeat again what I have said, that irrespective and regardless of my opinion or the behests or suggestion of the executive favor, if the people of the district are convinced, in their own mind, that the individual has been loyal and true they will reelect him, provided all other facts show that he is fit for the position.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. If the President would write a letter like that to ex-Senator Chilton, why should he write a letter in favor of Senator LEWIS and Mr. Davis and other men he has indorsed for sentatorial and congressional position?

Mr. DEWALT. When a gentleman propounds a conundrum of that kind, let him answer it. There are individual distinctions and differences sometimes made, but there are also moving causes in the mind of every one which operate at the time he makes the move. I declare affirmatively now that this general charge, this blanket accusation, if you please, that the President of the United States by attempting, as it is called, to interfere with elections, has only suggested to the people at large what his views are in regard to the patriotism or nonpatriotism of individuals running for office.

Now, I find that my friend from Illinois referred specifically to his Senator, the Hon. J. HAM LEWIS. Of course, argument is one thing and ridicule is another. It may be a matter of misfortune, or perhaps good fortune, that the Senator from Illinois is adorned with pink whiskers, as some people say. It may be his good or ill fortune that the biography, as established by the book which the gentleman read, makes him younger than he actually is, and makes him very precocious, but that does not meet the proposition at all. The proposition is just this: Is the Preseident held up to ridicule by the fact that he sent Senator LEWIS to Europe, and is he there upon a special mission? There is no proof of that. I am glad gentlemen enjoy what is being said about Senator LEWIS. Whether he is sent on a private or special mission is not the business of this House at this time, because the foreign relations of this country are purely an executive function and have always been so considered.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The Constitution provides that those who are sent abroad shall be confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. DEWALT. What proof have you or any other Member of this House that the honorable Senator from Illinois has been sent abroad on a mission?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The report as published in the newspapers and the attempted excuse that the gentleman makes for his being so sent.

Mr. DEWALT. I do not attempt to excuse him or the President of the United States any more than I would excuse or condemn the President of the United States for sending Col. House from Texas.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Is it not a fact that the President suggested that some of the Republican Senators should not be opposed on account of patriotic services? Did he not in the case of Senator NELSON?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes; and more. It is more significant possibly in reference to other matters. The President as you all know sent Mr. Root to Russia. I do not think he was confirmed by the Senate of the United States.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. No; but that commission and its purpose was openly avowed and understood by the people of the United States. May I ask the gentleman what particular State has a candidate of Republican faith that the President has indorsed?

Mr. DEWALT. The gentleman from North Carolina just referred to one, Senator NELSON.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I suggested the case of Senator NELSON.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. In a Republican State.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I am not talking about that.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. In answer to my friend on my left, it is true that the President offered no opposition to Senator NELSON, and Republicans are not advocating any opposition to JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS, of Mississippi.

Mr. DEWALT. And there they show their good sense. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. What the gentleman from Illinois read in the biography of Senator LEWIS—that he moved to Georgia two years before he was born—was a typographical error and really beneath being referred to by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DEWALT. It was really too small a matter for consideration by as big a man as is the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to make a correction there?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly.

Mr. GILLETT. In respect to this misprint, to which the gentleman from Tennessee refers, in the Biographical Directory, I referred to the biography of the Senator from Illinois in the Congressional Directory when he was a Member of the House from the State of Washington, and in that Congressional Directory I find that he was born in 1863. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman will have him only 11 years old when he was admitted to the bar.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. I do not quite understand some of the frivolous questions that have been asked by some gentlemen on the other side pertaining to Senator LEWIS. Is there anyone on that side who has questioned his loyalty or his ability? If there is, I would like whoever does to stand up. I think the mere fact that he is a year older or younger does not in any way affect his standing or ability or patriotism. He has at all times demonstrated that fact, and therefore is entitled to the support of all good people, not only in his State but all over the United States.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. No; I can not yield further.

Mr. GILLETT. The gentleman permitted the gentleman from Illinois to make a statement——

Mr. KNUTSON. In fairness the gentleman ought to hear the other side. The Senator voted against the bond issue in 1898.

Mr. DEWALT. I heard, too, from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG] a rather astounding statement, that when these great war measures, in which the administration called for the support of its policy, were under consideration the President was obliged, if you please, to look to the Republican side of the aisle for support. I beg gentlemen upon that side of the aisle to refer to the record as it stands, so that they may ascertain how many of them as loyal men voted against the tabling of the McLemore resolution.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Always to the Nestor of the House.

Mr. CANNON. And I hope the gentleman may have his time extended. I voted against the laying of the McLemore resolution on the table—a year before war was declared between this country and Germany.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Thirteen months.

Mr. DEWALT. Very well; but at the same time, although I have the greatest affection and respect for the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], I believe, too, that possibly he has seen the light of day and repents the action he took at that time in the light of subsequent events. We are all mistaken, of course, at times, and although I can affirm as a positive assertion that the distinguished gentleman from Illinois has perhaps been less mistaken than any other man in the House, yet he is not above and beyond the fact that sometimes people do make mistakes.

What is the fact in regard to this matter? In all these great propositions in regard to the war there was, if you speak frankly, no division upon partisan lines. Republicans joined in support of the administration, and I am quite glad and willing and frank enough to say so. The Democrats also joined in those measures, and it becomes, in my judgment, not only partisanship but bitter partisanship for a Member of the House, with a record such as I have established for the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG] by that which I have shown, now to make this invidious distinction about either side of the House.

There are but 7 Democrats who are members of the delegation from Pennsylvania. The rest of the 36 members, with the exception of 1, are Republicans, and I lay down the affirmative proposition now that every one of those men, whether he be Democrat, Independent, or Republican, is just as loyal as I am, and I propose to be loyal and affirm that I am. I do not think there is any distinction. I think that same thing could be said generally throughout the membership of the House. What, then, was the purpose of this argumentation here this morning? Was it to enlighten this House, or was it following the example set, if you please, at the other end of the Capitol, following the example of Senator LODGE, in proclaiming that now there must be a peace with victory, and that there must be certain established rules and edicts made before this war could be concluded. In reference to that, permit me to say that the President of the United States is blamed for keeping us out of war, and for saying that he proposed to be elected upon a platform "He kept us out of war." The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG] showed to us a little tag with the words upon it "Wilson's wisdom wins without war." I wish to God he had been able to win without war, and I do not believe there is an honest man here who does not voice that same wish. The gentleman says there must be peace with victory and that we must proclaim now that we are not ashamed to say that we demand a peace with victory, and that we shall from this time forth not say "we are too proud to fight." I have said that the President of the United States did keep us out of war as long as it was possible. When the inevitable came on the 6th day of April the consensus of opinion was so great that there were no votes, comparatively speaking, against his judgment. Why did he keep us out of the war and was trying to keep us out of war as far as possible? He was preparing the country with sentiment for the inevitable thing about to come. There was another momentous thing that occurred between the 2d day of April and the 28th of February. What was that? The revolution in Russia that occurred between those two dates, and, in my judgment—I may be wrong and faulty in it—I believe the President of the United States then determined it was absolutely necessary to take charge of the situation and ask for a declaration of war. But more than that, the President had warned Germany time and time again, had plead with Germany that it should cease its submarine warfare. Instead of that Germany kept on, and there was absolutely nothing else to do except to ask for a declaration of war.

Now, let me conclude by saying this: I unite with every Republican and every Democrat here in all patriotic sentiments that look to the prosecution of this war, and I believe inherently that this is the wrong time and particularly the wrong place to cast aspersions and attempt to belittle or besmirch or besmudge the official acts or the character of the President of the United States [applause], particularly when I find that in doing so the gentleman holds up to ridicule the Chief Executive of the Nation by saying that he goes to the drama, that he goes to the movies, and goes to the theater, and with him there he carries politics. It seems to me that it does not lie in the mouth of a Representative from a great State like Illinois to come to this assemblage and say that the President of the United States in pursuit, if you please, of recreation and relief from his ardent duties, should be belittled and ridiculed simply because he takes his wife and members of his official family to the theater, and therefore is accused of using politics in that direction. [Applause.]

I might add that the beloved martyr, Abraham Lincoln, to whom the gentleman from Illinois referred, was foully murdered in a theater whilst seeking recreation and alleviation from the great burdens he then so nobly bore in the defense of the Nation.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I ask that I may revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman if the remarks he is about to make upon this——

Mr. RAKER. I am going to devote my time and attention exclusively to the water-power bill.

Mr. WALSH. And that his remarks relate——

Mr. RAKER. To the water-power bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

THE NECESSITY FOR WATER-POWER DEVELOPMENT.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, the requirements of war have shown the tremendous necessity for the utilization of the falling waters of not only the United States but of the whole world for the production of electric energy.

As was recently truly said:

The development of our water powers would make the United States impregnable in time of war, commercially dominant in time of peace. Impregnable in time of war through furnishing the energy required for production of explosives and munitions, for operation of railroads, and in a thousand ways in the conduct of hostilities, thus releasing our man power for the Army and Navy; commercially dominant in time of peace through furnishing energy for industrial activities, electrical and electrochemical processes, for transportation, for agriculture, and for the innumerable things into which the use of power enters in the daily life of our citizens.

The safety, the welfare, the prosperity, and the progress of the Nation demand the prompt enactment of water-power laws in which protection of the public interest shall be coordinated with fairness toward capital. Power, electric energy, terrible in its war uses, but a God-given blessing when used to promote the comfort of mankind.

As our man power decreases—a considerable actual decrease is inevitable, and, relatively to the size of our task, a very great decrease is already upon us—the shortage in man power must be made up by the use of automatic machinery and various power-consuming appliances. There is scarcely any characteristic of these extended new enterprises so striking as the extent to which they use and depend upon electrical energy.

This increasingly great use of electric power is not something which will end with the war, so we should not allow any lingering apprehensions of future idle equipment to damp our energies in meeting the emergency demands which are upon us. In Great Britain plans far more comprehensive than anything even talked of here are being laid years ahead for increasing, interconnecting, and centralizing the supply of electrical energy, for making it the very lifeblood of a greater industrial England. This country must keep its place in the industrial world after the war—must increase it if our promised 25,000,000-ton merchant marine is to be given cargoes. If we grant this we are permanently face to face with this problem of power supply in all of its new-found importance. We must make our present emergency an opportunity, must keep mobilized our war-time spirit of comprehensive organization and efficiency. This is the time to formulate comprehensive plans for our future power supply.

I quote from an article recently published by a well-known engineer upon the "Coal supply of the United States":

The coal reserves of the United States are widely regarded as so enormous that no present thought need be given to their possible exhaustion. Enormous they unquestionably are, but at the rate at which coal consumption is increasing their life will become a matter of concern within another generation. Coal consumption during the last three years has been increasing at a rate of over 10 per cent per annum. For the past 20 years the increase amounts to 6½ per cent annually. The necessary production for 1918, as estimated by the Fuel Administration, is 710,000,000 tons, an increase over 1917 of 14.4 per cent. A conservative estimate of our present normal rate of increase is 7 per cent. On this basis, and with a rate of recovery from the mines as high as 67 per cent, the life of our known coal reserves would be as follows:

	Years.
Eastern district, which includes the most accessible and best quality of our fuel	56
Eastern, central, and southern districts	64
Entire United States and Alaska, over two-thirds of this being low-grade coals and lignites	83

(These figures are based upon estimates of the United States Geological Survey. They include coal in veins as shallow as 14 inches (35.5 cm.), all coal up to 30 per cent ash, and all known deposits within 6,000 feet (1,828 m.) of the surface. Obviously, on a corresponding basis the life of the coal reserves minable and usable under present standards would be much shorter. The reserves of fuel oil and natural gas are relatively so insignificant that they would have no appreciable effect on these figures.)

The figures are even more impressive when we consider that the United States has about 52 per cent of the coal reserves of the entire world and North America about 69 per cent. Outside of North America the only really large deposits are in China, and are not readily accessible. The next largest are in Germany. This means that in the future we must more and more be called upon to export coal.

Curtailment in our rate of increase in fuel use means either checking of our industrial development or increasing economy in the consumption of our fuel resources. Power supply is going to be the backbone of our future industrial development, and it is going to make increasingly great demands upon our fuel reserves. At the same time, power use of coal is the use which is most wasteful of its chemical and thermal value. Accordingly, every feasible fuel economy in power generation is called for.

The following estimate of the United States Geological Survey shows the available water horsepower in the different sections of the United States if developed to the practicable maximum without storage:

North Atlantic States	4,910,000
South Atlantic States	5,107,000
North Central States	4,270,000
South Central States	3,342,000
Western States	44,049,000
Total available potential horsepower	61,678,000

It is also estimated that with practicable maximum storage the total available water horsepower that could be produced in the United States would be 200,000,000. The present actual water-power development in the United States is about 6,000,000 horsepower, or 10 per cent of the amount available without storage and 3 per cent of the amount available with storage.

The Geological Survey report for the year 1913 shows that our consumption of coal for all purposes was about 570,048,125 short tons, of which the railroads alone used about 20 per cent. In addition to this, the petroleum used in 1913 was equivalent to 24,000,000 tons of coal. Every water horsepower now going to waste which could be economically substituted for fuel power would represent approximately 5½ tons of coal per year based on an average of 12 hours per day. To indicate what are the possibilities of conservation along this line we need merely to reflect upon the fact that the ultimate development of 61,678,000 horsepower on the foregoing coal-consumption basis is equivalent to the annual use of nearly 340,000,000 tons of coal—60 per cent of the total amount used in the United States—which at $2 per ton represents an annual value of $680,000,000. If all the water at these power sites were used constantly the foregoing coal-consumption figures would be doubled. Of course, this represents the maximum attainable development, which in all probability will not be approached for a long period, but it also represents the end which may finally be achieved. It is certain, however, that unless a start is made by the enactment of fair and practical legislation efforts to accomplish this much-to-be-desired result, even in small part, will fail. Every undeveloped water power for which a market now exists represents a willful waste of an exhaustible natural resource.

It is estimated that over 10,000,000 horsepower could be produced from dams installed in connection with the improvement of our inland waterways, and that were locks installed in the power dams over 4,000 miles of the upper reaches of these streams would be opened to navigation. The cost of these river improvements would be upward of $800,000,000, and, if accomplished by private capital for purpose of power production, would not cost the Government a dollar except for the bare locks and removal of minor obstacles in those portions of the streams not connected with power development. If these river improvements were in one stream, it would be equivalent to creating a navigable waterway across the continent from New York to San Francisco. But in reality it means the extension of navigation for an aggregate of 4,000 miles in 35 rivers, traversing 20 States in such widely different sections of the country as Connecticut, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Alabama, Georgia, Tennessee, Florida, Arkansas, Ohio, Kentucky, Missouri, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Washington, and Idaho.

While it will take a long period of time to improve all the inland waterways which could be made navigable in connection with development of water powers, yet every 100 miles helps, and the construction of river power dams will be begun in many different sections of the country as soon as Congress passes laws permitting safe investment of capital in water-power developments.

The inland waterways of the warring countries of Europe are being used to their utmost limit, and hundreds of miles of new canals have been built since the war began. A new waterway 182 miles long, connecting the Oder and the Vistula Rivers, has recently been opened to traffic, and 500-ton boats can go direct from Berlin to Warsaw and to the seaport of Danzig.

Germany has thousands of miles of canals and rivers which have been made navigable, and are being used for carrying heavy freight, leaving the railroads free to be used for the rapid transportation of troops and food supplies. It is said that were it not for her freight-carrying inland waterways the war would be over and Germany beaten, because the rapid movement of her troops from one front to another would have been seriously impeded had the railroads been occupied with heavy freight.

The greatest and most beneficial result of the utilization of our now-wasting water powers will be in their use in connection with the increase of food production through manufacture of electro-fertilizers.

Seven million tons of fertilizer, valued at $170,000,000, were sold in the United States during 1913, and for its manufacture over $40,000,000 of nitrogenous and other material was imported, most of which could have been made in this country with the aid of electricity. The average amount of fertilizers used in the United States is 28 pounds per acre of cultivated lands, against 200 pounds per acre in Europe, with the following results:

Comparison of average yield per acre, in bushels, of crops in the United States and Europe.

	Wheat.	Oats.	Barley.	Rye.	Potatoes.
Europe	32	47	38	30	158
United States	15	29	25	16	96

In 20 years some of the European countries have, through the use of fertilizer, increased the average of all crops to double the yield per acre in America. Before the war, Germany, with 70 per cent of the population of the United States and cultivating but one-fourth the area, produced 95 per cent of the food products which she consumed.

The crops harvested annually in the United States abstract over 1,000,000 tons of nitrogen from the soil, and as the world's supply of combined nitrogen is increased only slowly and in small degrees by nature, the soil of farmed lands is entirely dependent upon fertilizer for replenishment of the stock of nitrogen which it gives up in its yield of crops.

The present method of manufacture produces a finished product containing but 12 per cent of active fertilizer, and 88 per cent of utterly useless material, on which freight and haulage must be paid by the farmers; whereas, the electro-fertilizer product contains 60 per cent of fertilizing material.

The use of fertilizer has a most intimate relation to the cost of living, which has increased in this country at a much more rapid rate than it has abroad.

The population of the world doubles in 65 years, and with increase in numbers there is an increased per capita consumption of food.

The extraordinary increase in the cost of living in the United States has been principally in the cost of food products, while other items than foods have increased at only the general rate prevailing throughout the world. From 1900 to 1910 the cost of foods in the United States increased 35 per cent, and abroad only 15 per cent. While our population increased 21 per cent during those 10 years, crop production increased only 10 per cent, and our exportation of wheat and flour decreased from 31 per cent to 13 per cent of the amount produced. The rapid increase in food cost in this country can only be checked by increased crop production, just as food prices are held down in Europe through increase in yields per acre obtained without additional labor through the use of fertilizer. The countries of highest agricultural development are the largest consumers of fertilizers. If our use of fertilizer in 1913 had been equal to one-half of that of Europe per acre cultivated, 24,000,000 tons would have been required of the value of $600,000,000, and in the production of which 12,000,000 water horsepower must have been utilized, and the resultant increase of crop value would have exceeded $2,000,000,000.

It is estimated that there are at least 10,000,000 acres of arid lands located in the Far Western States, lying above the reach of gravity water, that can only be reclaimed through water raised by pumps operated by the cheap hydroelectric power now latent and wasting in the various streams from which the water would be pumped. Thus the land, and at a lower level the water to irrigate it, and the power to raise the water to the land are often all assembled at one point. Given water, these lands will produce every fruit, vegetable, and grain that is native to the temperate zone, and are capable of supporting a population of 2,000,000 people. With our water powers under development, it is safe to say that hundreds of thousands of water horsepower will be utilized within the next 10 years in connection with the reclamation of arid lands, and that in addition to what the Government service will accomplish, hundreds of millions of dollars of private capital will be used for establishment of reclamation projects in connection with pumping plants. Lands are being irrigated in 27 States and as far East as New Jersey and Florida, and two Western States have now nearly 5,000,000 acres of land under irrigation.

The internal development of a country must precede its external commerce, and the development of our water powers is vitally necessary to the industrial progress of the Nation, and will be of enormous importance after the war to the maintenance and growth of its foreign trade. In every one of the 20 years preceding the war of 1914 the foreign commerce of Germany exceeded that of the United States. For the single year 1912 it was $853,000,000 greater, and for the whole 20 years was $7,700,000,000 greater. There is nothing in that record for the United States to be proud of, for we have an area 17 times as great. We have 30 per cent more population; three times the accumulated wealth, and our natural resources are 20 times greater than those of Germany.

Looking forward to probable financial conditions after the close of the war. Property of all kinds will have depreciated greatly in physical condition and will have to be repaired. Stocks of merchandise will have become depleted and will have to be replenished. Projects of all kinds, interrupted by the war, will have to be completed. The commercial and industrial progress of the Nation, which will have practically been at a standstill during the war period, will be resumed and go forward with a mighty rush. This will mean an abnormal demand for money, and if to the risks and burdens of a naturally hazardous business, such as the operation of a water-power plant, is added harsh and restrictive government requirements and regulations, it will be impossible to secure capital for the pioneer work of power development.

American capital and investment is expected to supplant German capital in Italy and in many of the South American countries which have heretofore turned to Germany for the means of developing and financing natural resources. American capital in volume will be needed to finance the harnessing of Italy's water powers and electrification of her industries. Italy has no coal and the war has brought home to her realization of the necessity of availing herself of her water resources for the generating of motive power. Italian capital is not sufficient to cope with the immensity of the problem, and she will undoubtedly turn to the United States for financial aid.

I am credibly informed that large banking houses in New York have already received urgent appeals for money to be used in development of foreign water powers, with the assurance of practically unlimited franchises and in some cases government bonuses.

We must not make the Federal laws governing development of the water powers of the United States so restrictive as to turn American capital too much toward development of foreign water powers. Legislation should encourage business, not hamper it. The development of our water powers is of vital necessity for promoting the safety, the comfort, the welfare, and the prosperity of every citizen of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, these remarks I have just made are in regard to the general development of water-power legislation. We are now down to the real meat of this bill. General debate has concluded and it will be now up to the Congress and this committee in the first instance to report any amendment that may be offered or some that may be added if thought necessary to make this bill actually workable. I believe in a general way the bill is workable. The bill contains necessary legislation that will develop the water powers of this country some 60,000,000 horsepower. Much time and much attention has been given to this subject in the House in the last six years. Much time has been given it in the Senate. It has been my fortune to have been on the Committee on Public Lands for the last six years, having supervision of water-power legislation as relating to the public lands, which bill has passed the House twice and is again reported this year, and under the arrangement in appointing the Special Water-Power Committee in the selection of five members from the Committee on Public Lands, Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and the Committee on Agriculture I am again placed as one of the members of that committee, and I have heard all the testimony not only that in the Public Lands Committee of the House, but have read that which has been given before the committee in the Senate for the last six years and have heard the testimony as given before the special Water-Power Committee, which in all amounts to many thousand pages. The last volume is over a thousand pages.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield just for a question?

Mr. RAKER. I yield for a question.

Mr. WALSH. The reason I wanted to ask the gentleman a question is because of the great and serious attention that he has given to this subject, and I know that he is familiar with the problems that present themselves in his part of the country. Now, I would like to ask him if he can tell me quickly and briefly, within the time he has remaining, which plan he favors on the recapture proposition?

Mr. RAKER. I am going to do that before I get through.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. RAKER. I ask unanimous consent that I may have 10 minutes at this time. I took no time under general debate, and it was understood we should have liberal debate under the five-minute rule. I would like to make a few general remarks now and take as little time as possible when we come to the general provisions of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I will.

Mr. SINNOTT. The gentleman spoke of the estimate of 60,000,000 horsepower. That is without storage. The storage, I understand, is something like 200,000,000.

Mr. RAKER. This is without storage; yes. This is only about 60,000,000 and about 200,000,000 with storage. Of course, there is a difference between the engineers as to the exact amount, but that is near enough, approximately.

I was present at the time the conference was held with the President by these three committees, and I have given the subject some consideration. Like others, we differ. But there are some of these things that are to my mind, as I view it, familiar. While I might differ with others, I am going to give the House, as I see it, some of the benefit of that study and consideration. I want to say, generally, that I believe this water-power legislation as now presented, with the exception that I am going to name, is workable, that it will protect the Government in the rights that it now holds; that it will give the investor fair and decent treatment and a fair return for the money invested and a sufficient opportunity to develop these powers. And it will give the consuming public a fair opportunity to receive electrical energy at a reasonable rate and not overburden it with fictitious charges and watered stock, and other conditions that are so burdensome at the present time. The question of the length of time, guarded as it is, I believe is all right. Under the present system where we have a revocable permit, no man can develop, no institution can develop, no association, no municipality, can develop; and there should be a fixed period, with rules and regulations for control, to the end that the investor may know, that the public may know, and the consuming public be treated fairly and properly.

These general matters have been provided for in the bill by the creation of a commission, and turning over the authority to the Government where there is no State commission, and to a State commission where there is a commission authorized and organized for the purpose of adjusting these rates and fixing the question of the bond issues and capital issues, and so forth. The commission is the proper thing. It brings unity of action from the three departments, where the Interior Department and the Department of Agriculture and the War Department can combine their judgment. And you will get better results than if you leave it to one. And so while one man may be familiar with the particular subject in hand, the others, by studying the conditions, may be able to secure better results.

I want to say that some of the western papers, and I notice the Oregon Voter—and I will insert some of their opinions in my remarks later—say that the bill is all restriction and gives the investor no opportunity. I think it is wrong on that. The farmers' organization stands the other way, and says that the bill is all for monopoly and corporation, and gives the consumer and public no opportunity. They are both wrong.

Mr. McARTHUR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. No; I can not yield for just a moment.

One leans too far one way and the other leans too far in the other direction—both leading apart and getting no results.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. McARTHUR. By the farmers' organization does the gentleman mean the grange or this disloyal, nonpartisan league we hear about?

Mr. RAKER. Oh, I do not know anything about that. This comes from the farmers' national headquarters. They have sent out a circular opposing this legislation because it gives a 50-year lease, and saying it is intended to prohibit future Government ownership or municipal ownership.

Now, this bill provides for that. It provides that the State or municipality may apply for this lease and may obtain it, and there is no preferential right given except in one instance, where a license may be issued to any citizen of the United States, or any association of citizens, or to any corporation, or to a State or municipality, for the purpose of constructing, and so forth. Then there is another provision that provides in section 7 that "in issuing preliminary permits or licenses hereunder, the commission may, in its discretion, give preference to applications therefor by States and municipalities, provided the plans for the same are deemed by the commission to be best adapted to conserve and utilize in the public interest the navigation and water resources of the region." So that we find that both parties, as I believe, are far afield. What we want is legislation that is workable, that will protect the Government, and at the same time give capital fair treatment and the consuming public as well, but will not prohibit the States or municipalities from operating if they desire. That must be right.

But now in the bill there are two fundamentally wrong propositions, and I must say in frankness that as to one I do not believe it was called to the attention of the committee. That is the one providing that we give to any corporation the right to this permit or license, irrespective of its nationality, irrespective of whom the members may be, aliens or otherwise. When that is called to the attention of the House I do not believe there will be any doubt but that we will amend it, as to what corporations shall get this license for 50 years, to the end that foreigners may not go on our public domain and obtain water-power leases for 50 years. It ought not to be permitted. I know it was not called to the attention of the committee.

It was in connection with former legislation in the Committee on Public Lands, in regard to the leasing of coal and gas and phosphates, and to the House in this bill. But the question in the Committee on Water Power was overlooked. I overlooked it, although I had an amendment that I had prepared in connection with the former legislation that I wanted to call to the attention of the committee. But this Congress ought not to permit a corporation composed of aliens to receive these permits or licenses. It says "any corporation or association." That would permit a foreign corporation. But the language later restricts it, where it says, "It shall be a domestic corporation in any State or Territory." It should be provided that at least a majority of the organization or stockholders should be citizens of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more. I want to submit one more question. Then I shall not take any further time to-night.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. SINNOTT. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to the definition of a corporation in section 3. A corporation must be a corporation organized under the laws of a State.

Mr. RAKER. That might include a foreign corporation. Then, there is another suggestion, and that is that the majority of the stockholders might be foreigners. They should not be allowed to obtain a lease or license for 50 years. The bill should be amended in that particular. At the proper time I will offer the amendment.

Now, there is another thing which is fundamental, and it surrounds this entire legislation, and this is the "net-investment clause." The more one studies that the more one is compelled to come to the conclusion that the net-investment idea in this bill is wrong from every standpoint. The original provision of the bill fixing "the fair value, not to exceed actual cost," and so forth, for recapture gives the man all that he is entitled to; and with the provision in section 14, which says that he shall not charge for gifts or donations or rights of way or other property, that is fully protected and the consuming public is protected, so that when water rights are given him he can not turn around and charge enormous profits to the Government on recapture and ask millions of dollars for it.

Now, I have been trying to find out what this net-investment proposition is. I want to call your attention to the fact that that was not put in the hearings and there is no discussion of it in the hearings. I do not believe that there is any man on the floor of the House who can define what it is from the language used in this bill. Let me read it to you:

"Net investment" in a project means the actual legitimate original cost thereof as defined and interpreted in the "Classification of investment in road and equipment of steam roads, issue of 1914, Interstate Commerce Commission," plus similar costs of additions thereto and betterments thereof, minus the sum of the following items properly allocated thereto, if and to the extent that such items have been accumulated during the period of the license from earnings in excess of a fair return on such investment: (a) Unappropriated surplus, (b) aggregate credit balances of current depreciation accounts, and (c) aggregate appropriations of surplus or income held in amortization, sinking fund, or similar reserves, or expended for additions or betterments. The term "cost" shall include, in so far as applicable, the elements thereof prescribed in said classification, but shall not include expenditures from funds obtained through donations by States, municipalities, individuals, or others.

What is that? Was it before the committee? Who has read it? A man came into my office a few days ago and said, "Will you show me that report? Will you show me what that means?"

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. In a moment. I began to investigate. I began to investigate through the Interstate Commerce Commission, and tried to dig out what it means. Here is the report that is referred to, and I do not believe there is a man on the floor of the House to-day who can determine what "net investment" is from that report. Then, I want to read to you a letter from the Interstate Commerce Commission received to-day. I read:

Replying to your inquiry as to the meaning of the term "net road and equipment charge," appearing in the Statistics of Railroads of the United States for 1914, I would say that this is the book value of the road and equipment owned by the railways in the United States, less the reserve for accrued depreciation. This reserve for accrued depreciation results from charges made annually to operating expenses on account of depreciation in equipment. It does not represent the full amount of the depreciation of the railroad property which might be shown by an inventory, such as our Bureau of Valuation is now making. The difference between the cost of all the property new and its present condition is doubtless greater than is shown in the reserve for accrued depreciation.

Now, this is what I want to call your attention to:

It should be stated that the form of the balance sheet was changed after 1914.

Continuing:

I am sending herewith a copy of the text of the Statistics of Railways in the United States for the year 1916. On pages 94 and 95 the investment in road and equipment is shown on the asset side and the reserve for accrued depreciation is shown under unadjusted credits on the liability side, and the latter of these items must be subtracted from the former in order to get a figure corresponding to the net road and equipment charge in the 1914 statistics.

I am also sending a copy of the preliminary statistics of common carriers for the calendar year 1916, which will show these figures for individual large roads. The corresponding publication for 1917 is in the hands of the printer.

I am also sending copies of the classifications of operating revenues, operating expenses, income, and general balance sheet accounts which are now in effect.

It is only a question of form, and after investigating it the Interstate Commerce Commission has changed this form, page after page of it, by adding to it and subtracting from it. That is, as to the net investment on a railroad property. Now, after a man has used a water power for 50 years and received a proper return on it for costs and charges, for upkeep and maintenance, instead of saying, "We will pay you the actual cost of it at the time we take it over," if you say that it must be according to this hard and fast form, it is confusing and misleading. The Interstate Commerce Commission, as I say, have been compelled to change this form since it was printed in 1914. Why should we make it a hard and fast rule of net investment? If we enact this into law, we make it hard and fast and can not change it. If the Interstate Commerce Commission after their investigation find that they should make still further changes, we will have adopted a hard and fast rule which we can not change after the 50-year license has been granted. Why not adopt the sensible rule of "paying the fair value not to exceed actual cost of the property," and so forth, to the licensee for his property at the time you take it over and make it a part of the contract that can not be changed. Everyone then knows just what will happen upon recapture of the property. The bill should be changed in this respect back to its original form.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, it is late and very few of the Members are present. I want to say that we have the remaining four days of this week for the consideration of this bill; but further, there are a number of Members who took no part at all in the general debate whom I assured that when it came to the five-minute debate, and to the contested portion of the bill, there would be reasonable liberality in allowing debate upon the contested matter. I want to do that. I want to keep that prominent throughout. Therefore I shall object to any further requests for unanimous consent to make speeches on any subject, no matter what it is, except this water-power bill, and the debate on the bill must be confined to the subject matter under discussion.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, after giving this notice, which I think is fair and proper, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WEBB, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 1419) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the proceedings had during the recess in honor of the Uruguay delegation to-day, including a translation of the speech of Dr. Brum, be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks that the proceedings during the recess in honor of the Uruguay commission, including a translation of the remarks, be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 4 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Wednesday, August 28, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, August 28, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, in the pursuit of the ideals upon which we have founded a Government and in following the lines of life laid down for us by our fathers we have been called to make a complete surrender of ourselves, of our interests, of our powers in furtherance of our great spiritual democracy. We pray that Thy blessing may be upon us as we enter more and more into a world conflict. As we lay our fortunes, as we send our boys, as we give our lives to the interests of humanity do Thou, O God of us all, smile upon us, give us success, and bring us to speedy victory.

Again and again we are called upon to mourn the loss of one of our leaders and master spirits. To-day the news reaches us of the death of the senior Senator from Kentucky. This great man so lately stood among us in strength and glory of young manhood, endowed with splendid qualities of leadership, strong in his friendships, loyal to the country, and devoted to the highest ideals of our national life. In Thy providence his spirit has been called back to God who gave it.

We thank Thee for all the service he rendered to our Government and for the devotion which he manifested in the well-being of humanity. Let Thy mercy be with those who constitute the inner circle of his family and friends, and enable us to perpetuate in our lives all that was best in his.

For Christ's sake. Amen.

On request of Mr. THOMAS, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Thursday, August 22, 1918, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

AIRCRAFT PRODUCTION.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, my attention has been called to the fact that the Associated and other press dispatches have misstated the recent report of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs upon the subject of aviation in a very important particular. I refer to the first appropriation of $640,000,000 for aviation purposes, a substantial part of which the committee reported to have been practically wasted.

The statement which has gone the rounds of the press is that according to the report the entire sum has been wasted. That does injustice, and very serious injustice, to the authorities having the disposal of this fund, scarcely one-half of which up to this time has been actually expended.

The necessity of calling attention to this is due to the facts, and because wide publicity has been given to the erroneous statement, which if uncontradicted will be accepted as true, when the facts are otherwise.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator from Colorado be kind enough to inform me whether he can state that half of the appropriation of $640,000,000 is still subject to the disposal of the proper officials?

Mr. THOMAS. Commitments have been made for it through contracts and orders in process of performance.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is what I wanted to find out.

DEATH OF SENATOR JAMES.

Mr. BECKHAM. Mr. President, it is my sad duty to announce to the Senate the death of my distinguished colleague, Hon. OLLIE M. JAMES, which occurred at the Johns Hopkins Hospital in Baltimore this morning about 6.30, and while it has not been unexpected for some time it comes as a great shock to all of us and to all who knew him. I am sure, Mr. President, that in my State there is universal and profound sorrow, and I feel equally sure that here in this body among the Members who have associated with him for nearly six years there is also the deepest sorrow. We shall miss his genial, generous character, and among all of the losses which our body has sustained in the present Congress none, I am sure, will be felt more than that of Senator JAMES.

It is unfortunate, Mr. President, it seems to us, that we can not understand the Divine purpose when a young man of his age, in the very prime of his manhood, and at a time when his splendid abilities and services were most useful to his State and to the Nation, should be taken away.

But it is not now the time to pay full and proper tribute to his character and life. Upon another occasion later on those of us who knew him so well, who loved and admired him, will have the opportunity of doing so.

I send to the desk, Mr. President, resolutions which I ask may be read and adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolutions.

The resolutions (S. Res. 294) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Hon. OLLIE M. JAMES, late a Senator from the State of Kentucky.

Resolved, That a committee of 15 Senators be appointed by the President pro tempore to take order for superintending the funeral of Mr. JAMES, to be held in the city of Marion, Ky.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Under the second resolution the President pro tempore appointed Mr. BECKHAM, Mr. SIMMONS, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. SMITH of Arizona, Mr. POMERENE, Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. UNDERWOOD, Mr. KENDRICK, Mr. PENROSE, Mr. BORAH, Mr. WEEKS, Mr. KENYON, Mr. FALL, Mr. CURTIS, and Mr. HARDING as the committee on the part of the Senate.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, this was the day which had been agreed to by the Senate for holding memorial exercises in respect to the memory of the late Senator from Nevada, FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS. I, as does every Member of the Senate, concur in the sentiments expressed by the Senator from Kentucky relative to our beloved friend, and, of course, in the circumstances it is fit and proper that this body shall adjourn in accordance with custom, and I have been informed by the Senator from Kentucky that he is about to make such a motion. I know that the action proposed by the Senator from Kentucky will meet with the entire approval of the family of the late Senator and that this custom of the Senate is thoroughly understood. But before action is taken upon that motion out of respect to the late Senator JAMES, I give notice that on Monday morning, immediately after the Senate convenes, the memorial exercises in respect to the memory of the late Senator FRANCIS GRIFFITH NEWLANDS will be held by unanimous consent.

Mr. BECKHAM. Mr. President, as a further mark of respect to the memory of Senator JAMES I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, August 29, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, August 28, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in Heaven, we thank Thee that the American Army in France has for its commander in chief not only a brave, gallant, and efficient soldier, but a Christian gentleman, whose faith in God is unbounded as disclosed in the incomparable life, character, and precepts of His son Jesus Christ, who represents the Father in the concrete and man at his best.

The words which come from Gen. Pershing to the people of America are altogether reassuring:

"The invisible, unconquerable force let loose by the prayers, hopes, and ideals of Christian America is incalculable, and furnishes the soul and the motive for the military body and its cooperation; it steadies us to resist manfully the temptations which assail us in the extraordinary conditions in which we find ourselves."

God be with him, his soldiers, and their associates, and grant them a speedy victory for the world.

Our Father, again we are called upon to mourn the loss of one of the congressional family. We knew him on the floor of this House—a strong, efficient, wise man. We have known him as a Senator, full of enthusiasm, strength, and potency. Comfort us and be especially with his widow and those who are near and dear to him, and bring us at last into one of those many mansions prepared by the Savior for Thy children. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendment the bill (H. R. 12731) amending the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," had requested a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendment, and had appointed Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. HITCHCOCK, and Mr. WARREN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

CHANGES IN DRAFT LAW.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House disagree to the Senate amendments to the bill H. R. 12731 and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to disagree to the Senate amendments to the House bill 12731 and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. Is there objection?

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask if there will be an opportunity for the House to express itself in regard to an amendment which I introduced, which was adopted by the House, drafting aliens, and which was left out by the Senate?

Mr. DENT. I will say to the gentleman that I can not make any promises as to what the conferees will do, but I will say that I think I have an idea as to what the sentiment of this House is on that subject, and I shall try to carry out the sentiment of the House in conference.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. GILLETT. It seems to me that this proposition is different from the ordinary amendment. Here was a case where the House by an overwhelming majority put on an amendment against the position of the committee, and therefore the conferees, as the House knows, are personally, or were at the time, against the action of the House. So it seems to me that it would be no more than fair for the conferees to agree in such a case that the House should have an opportunity before they assented to the Senate proposition to express its opinion.

Mr. DENT. I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that the conferees on the part of the House have always undertaken to carry out the will of the House whenever expressed, even if contrary to their own personal judgment. I shall undertake to do that, and I think I can speak for the other conferees to the same effect.

Mr. GILLETT. I assume that, but at the same time the gentleman will recognize that human nature is such that the House would have more confidence if the conferees were in sympathy with the action of the House, and under these circumstances it does not seem too much for the gentleman from Ohio to ask that the House shall be assured of an opportunity to express its views.

Mr. DENT. Would not the House have the opportunity to do that?

Mr. GILLETT. The gentleman well knows that after a conference report is agreed to it is very difficult to vote down a conference report simply on that ground, much more difficult than it would be to have a vote on that one proposition.

Mr. DENT. I trust that the gentleman from Massachusetts will not insist that the conferees, whoever they may be, shall make any absolute promise as to what may be done. I hope the gentleman will allow them to go into conference with their hands untied after making the statement that I have made that they propose to stand by the will of the House, as they understand it, as far as they are able.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the Senate has put on an amendment which requires the Government to furnish uniforms of officers at cost. That was on at least one other bill as it passed the Senate, and the conferees took it out, as I understand it, because the department said that the same result would be accomplished by regulations.

Mr. DENT. Because the department said it was being taken care of.

Mr. MAPES. The fact is it has not been taken care of.

Mr. DENT. I have not been so informed, but I will try to ascertain, and if the department has not taken care of the situation by regulation I shall have no objection to having it go into the bill.

Mr. MAPES. I looked it up within the last 10 days, and it had not been taken care of. Personally I can see no objection whatever to its being incorporated into the law even if it is being taken care of by regulation of the department.

Mr. DENT. The only objection to incorporating it into the law is that a situation might arise that would embarrass the Government in the administration of this matter; that is the only objection I have ever had to it. If the department has not done as they indicated to me I have no objection to its incorporation into the bill.

Mr. MAPES. I do not ask the gentleman to commit himself definitely, but as I understand he is favorable to the legislation.

Mr. DENT. Yes; with the exception that I have stated.

Mr. MAPES. I hope it may remain in the bill. I have received a great many complaints about the abuses sought to be corrected by it.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I desire to say to the chairman in regard to the question raised by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] that I understand the Senate amendment provided for different classes of uniforms for officers of different ranks. I wish to say that if the amendment remains in the bill I hope the conferees will see that there is no discrimination between officers of the United States Army as to the character of the uniform.

Mr. DENT. I agree with my colleague on the committee in respect to that idea.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I understand that the Senate has struck out the amendment known as the McCulloch amendment in regard to drafting cobelligerents and aliens.

Mr. DENT. That was stricken out by the Senate. I have just made a statement that I hope the House would not undertake to tie the hands of the conferees upon any subject matter involved in this bill. I understand the sentiment of the House upon that subject, and if I am appointed as a conferee I propose to carry out the will of the House as far as I am able.

Mr. BURNETT. Before the gentleman would agree with the Senate in striking it out, would he not agree that we should have an expression from the House in regard to the matter?

Mr. DENT. As I have already stated, I hope the gentleman will not insist upon my making an absolute promise of that kind. If I did it in this respect, I would be expected to do it in many other respects, and the result would be that this bill would be going backward and forward for no one knows how long. I hope the House will trust the conferees to carry into effect what is known to be the sense of the House on that proposition.

Mr. BURNETT. The gentleman realizes there was a very emphatic expression of the House upon that proposition.

Mr. DENT. I do. I think I understand the will of the House upon that subject and shall undertake to carry it out.

Mr. BURNETT. I am willing to trust the gentleman and the conferees in regard to that matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to say, in view of the statement of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] that he will give this matter consideration, and that the House will have an opportunity to act upon it probably, I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER announced the following conferees: Mr. DENT, Mr. FIELDS, and Mr. KAHN.

SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE FOR TO-MORROW.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] to preside to-morrow as Speaker pro tempore.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, August 29, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, as we come together to give expression to the will of a great people and to help shape the policy of a nation, we feel the ever-increasing weight of the responsibility of this high office, and we seek Thy favor and blessing. As we toil to-day over the problems that present themselves to us at home, we remember the boys on the battle front, those who have been wounded, those who are crowding into the hospitals, those who are trooping to the colors. We ask Thy blessing, O God, the God of nations, upon them. Shelter them from harm. Give them the divine presence. Guide them in the day of their danger. Sanctify the supreme sacrifice of any who may be called upon to die for us and for our land, and hasten the day when they shall come back with victory upon their banners. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

Hedtke, of Mandan; of the Sunday school of the Methodist Church of Edgely; of the congregation of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Cathay; and of sundry citizens of Berwick, Bethania, Tunbridge, Maza, Douglas, Dawson, Minnewaukan, Walhalla, and Cavalier, all in the State of North Dakota, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE BOARD OF TEMPERANCE OF THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Pittsburgh, Pa., August 28, 1918.

Hon. WILLIAM S. KENYON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, with a membership of more than 1,700,000, through its board of temperance, most earnestly petitions the United States Senate to vote for the entire prohibition of all alcoholic beverages during the period of the war and demobilization and provide that the same shall go into effect at the earliest practicable date, at least not later than January 1, 1919.

This church has tens of thousands of sons in the service of their country, behind whom are a host of patriotic, anxious parents, eager that every reasonable safeguard shall be afforded their sons in order that they may render the highest and largest possible service.

Respectfully submitted.

THOS. WATTERS,
President of the Board.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I have a telegram from the president of the University of Michigan, of the Michigan Agricultural College, of Adrian College, of Hope College, of Olivet College, of Alma College, of Hillsdale College, and of Kalamazoo College, all of Michigan, urging that the exemption clause of section 700 of the present war-revenue act be retained in the revenue bill now being formulated. I desire to have the telegram referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That action will be taken.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have letters from the Anti-Saloon League of America and from the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union in favor of war prohibition, which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, we have agreed in the past not to fill the RECORD with such letters. While I am in full accord with the statement made in the letters—we have all received them—I object to having any more read into the RECORD.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Why did not the Senator object to the letter submitted by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] from the president of the board of temperance of the Presbyterian Church?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator presented it and said it was only a short letter or I would have objected. I do not want the Senator to make the request because we are not going to encumber the RECORD with these matters.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Does the Senator object to having the letter read from one organization?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I withdraw the letters and will read them in my own time later.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letters will be returned to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CALDER. I present the petition of the Intercollegiate Prohibition Association, which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be done.

Mr. CALDER. I also present other petitions from citizens of various cities in New York State on the subject of war-time prohibition, which I ask be appropriately referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That action will be taken.

Mr. CALDER presented petitions of the Anti-Saloon League, of New York, and of sundry citizens of Waterville, Cobleskill, Ransomville, Plattsburg, Niagara Falls, Tannersville, Penn Yan, and Huntington, all in the State of New York, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have in my hand petitions from hundreds, if not thousands, of citizens of my State urging war-time prohibition. I am not going to ask that they be printed in the RECORD, and I am not going to send them to the desk, but I simply make this statement so that the RECORD will show that the people of our State are extremely interested in favor of the passage of this legislation.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I present a telegram from Miss M. L. Montgomery, president of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Mississippi with the request that it be printed in the RECORD. I understand the order has been made by the Senate prohibiting such telegrams from being printed in the RECORD, and I want the facts in this message to appear in the RECORD. The petitioner expresses a very earnest desire that this war-prohibition measure may be enacted to take effect immediately. And I approve of that sentiment most heartily. If we need prohibition in this country at any time, and I think we do, we need it now. To postpone prohibition as is proposed in this amendment is, in my judgment, a betrayal of the cause of temperance.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I shall object hereafter to explanations of telegrams. It does not save the RECORD and does not save paper, and we might just as well print them as to have a statement made. I assure my friend from Mississippi that my remarks are not directed especially to his position this morning, but under the law passed by this body, affecting the printing, the mere presentation of petitions is noted, by whom presented, and what was embraced in the petition itself.

Mr. VARDAMAN. May I ask the Senator if that is a rule adopted by this body, or has it been dictated by the Senator to us?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Unquestionably it is the rule. It is one of the oldest rules of the Senate, that in the morning hour a Senator can be called to order if he undertakes to read a petition at length. At another time of the day the Senator may take the floor and make a speech and have it printed in the RECORD if he wants to do so.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I do not desire to transgress the rules of this body, but I have a right to speak for the people of Mississippi, touching matters which concern them, in the morning hour. And the people of Mississippi are very much interested in the question of prohibition.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I present a memorial of wine growers of California, and ask that it be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator ask that it be read or just noted?

Mr. PHELAN. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California asks that the memorial presented by him be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. I object to its being printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. PHELAN. The only reason why I make the request is in view of the fact that a petition in behalf of prohibition was allowed to be printed in the RECORD, and under the right of petition I think that both sides should be fairly represented to this body.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no objection to that if it is in order, but it is not in order at this time.

Mr. PHELAN. Then, I shall have to read it in the course of my address.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will be noted in the RECORD.

Mr. PHELAN presented a memorial of the California Grape Protective Association, remonstrating against national prohibition as a war measure, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PENROSE (for Mr. KNOX) presented petitions of sundry citizens of Altoona, Lash, Kerrmoor, Lowber, Bloom, Lumber City, Pittsburgh, Mechanicsburg, Ransom, York, Harrisburg, Berlin, and Philadelphia, all in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also (for Mr. KNOX) presented a petition of sundry citizens of Allegheny County, Pa., praying for the substitution of the oath required of enlisted men for the oath required of officers, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland presented petitions of sundry citizens of Cardiff, Relay, Highlandtown, Cumberland, Brooklandville, Solomons, Rising Sun, Riderwood, Baltimore, Hagerstown, Govans, Havre de Grace, Oldtown, Northeast, Ellicott City, Laurel, Port Deposit, Frostburg, and Reisterstown, and of sundry citizens of Montgomery and Dorchester Counties, all in the State of Maryland, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BRANDEGEE (for Mr. McLEAN) presented a memorial of Capitol City Lodge, of Hartford, Conn., and a memorial of Charter Oak Lodge, of Hartford, Conn., remonstrating against the passage of the proposed prohibition amendment, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also (for Mr McLEANQ presented petitions of the Methodist camp meeting of Willimantic; of the congregation of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Thomaston; of the Seymour Manufacturing Co., of Seymour; of Clinton Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, of Clinton; of the congregation of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Cheshire; of the congregation of the Methodist Church of New London; and of the Red Cross Auxiliary of Plainfield, all in the State of Connecticut, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also (for Mr. McLEAN) presented a petition of the Theatrical Federation, of Hartford, Conn., and a petition of Elm Lodge, of New Haven, Conn., praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WEEKS presented petitions of sundry citizens of Roxbury, Charlton, and Medford, all in the State of Massachusetts, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WARREN presented petitions of 55 citizens of Gebo; of 85 citizens of Midwest, and of 300 citizens of Laramie; of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Gillette; and of sundry citizens of Casper, Rock Springs, Cody, Hanna, Upton, and Cheyenne, all in the State of Wyoming, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a petition of sundry citizens of Hubbell, Calumet, Lake Linden, and Perry, and a petition of the congregations of the Methodist Episcopal and Presbyterian Churches of Decatur, all in the State of Michigan, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of sundry citizens of Bucksport, Me., and a petition of sundry citizens of Orland, Me., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SHAFROTH presented petitions of sundry citizens of Denver, Glenwood Springs, Golden, Pueblo, Fort Collins, and Sterling, all in the State of Colorado, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WADSWORTH presented petitions of sundry citizens of Syracuse, Dewitt, Watertown, Rochester, Auburn, Sanborn, Cardiff, Gainesville, White Plains, Madison, Waterloo, Buffalo, Brooklyn, Staten Island, Jamestown, New York City, Frankfort, Lakewood, and Hartsville, all in the State of New York, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Kingston and Newburgh, and of the Retail Liquor Dealers' Association of New York City, all in the State of New York, remonstrating against the passage of the proposed prohibition amendment, which were ordered to lie on the table.

INDEPENDENCE OF LITHUANIA AND LETTONIA.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am going to ask to have something printed in the RECORD. It relates to the speech I made last Friday, a brief speech in regard to the essential terms of peace. This is a statement in regard to Lithuania, Livonia, and Esthonia. I did not attempt in that speech to cover every possible phase of the relations of different people in Europe. It was utterly out of the question to go into every detail. But I did know about the Lithuanians and the Letts, who are people of a different race, neither Germans nor Slavs. I think there are ten or twelve million, and I am in entire sympathy with their desire and their rightful aspirations for an independent republic. They cover what are known as the Baltic Provinces of Russia.

I have a brief statement here in regard to them which I should like to print in the RECORD in connection with what I am now saying. The writer says that I disagree with President Wilson's principle on the liberation of races and nations. I do not. That is a complete mistake. I took pains to mention in another part of my speech that I favored as one of the objects of the war the independence of races and nations as defined by the President.

I merely desire to print this with what I am now saying in order to correct a wrong impression in regard to my previous speech and also to lay before the Senate and the country the case of the Lithuanians and Letts, with which I have the deepest sympathy, and which I sincerely hope and believe will be brought to pass, giving them an independent life as a nation when peace is reached.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the publication of the statement in the RECORD?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I could not hear the Senator distinctly on account of an excessive cold I have. I ask the Senator whether it is in the nature of a personal explanation?

Mr. LODGE. What I have said was a personal explanation. What I ask to have printed is a statement in regard to the Lithuanians and the Letts, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD, because I am in entire sympathy with it and desire the Senate to know about it. It is in connection with the speech I made.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It is in connection with the Senator's speech?

Mr. LODGE. It is entirely in connection with it—nothing else.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Under that peculiar condition I shall not object.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A BRIEF WHY LITHUANIA AND LETTONIA SHOULD BE RECOGNIZED AS AN INDEPENDENT NATION.

"August 23, 1918, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD published the speech of Senator LODGE in the United States Senate which is considered to be of world-wide importance, since it was applauded in Great Britain, France, and other countries.

"Among other matters the Senator says:

"'We must face facts and strive for a complete veracity of mind. * * * Generalities will not serve. * * * It must be a just and righteous peace. * * * We intend to make the world safe for democracy. * * * We are fighting and our allies are fighting with us for security, for independence, for the right of nations, great and small, to govern themselves in their own way; for organized races and peoples to have the opportunity to govern themselves in independent states; for the sanctity and observance of treaties; for the general disarmament of nations. * * * Broadly speaking, there is only one way to obtain this security of the nations, this safety of democracy, this preservation of freedom and civilization, and that is by reducing Germany to a condition where by no possibility can she precipitate another war for universal conquest, with all its attendant horrors, upon an unoffending world. * * * (Belgium, Alsace-Lorraine, Italia Irridenta, Serbia, Roumania, and Greece must be made secure.) Most important of all, if we are to make the world safe in the way we mean it to be safe the great Slav populations now under the Government of Austria—the Jugo-Slavs and the Czecho-Slovaks, who have been used to aid the Germans, whom they loathe—must be established as independent states. The Polish people must have an independent Poland. * * * The Russian Provinces taken from Russia by the villainous peace of Brest-Litovsk must be restored to Russia. The President, as you all remember, has announced the vast importance of sustaining Russia. If Germany continues to hold a large part of Russia the world for years to come will be under the shadow of another great war, which will surely be precipitated upon us when Germany has developed her Russian possessions to the point of yielding her men, money, and supplies. * * * Palestine must never return to Turkish rule, and the persecuted Christians of Asia Minor—the Syrians and the Armenians—must be made safe. * * * Our part and our business is to put Germany in a position where she can do no more harm in the future to the rest of the world. * * * As this war is utterly different from any war that the world has ever known, so must the peace which concludes it be utterly different from any peace which the world has ever known. It can not be a peace of bargain, of give and take, and of arrangement.'

"Now has come the time to put an end to all injustices in the relations of nations to each other. The rights as well as duties of all peoples and by all nations must reciprocally be recognized and acknowledged.

"Yet in the speech of Senator LODGE 'the Russian Provinces taken from Russia by the villainous peace of Brest-Litovsk must be restored to Russia.'

"Russia consisted of 116 nationalities; the majority of them were robbed of their liberty by the force of arms, by might having been placed before right.

"We are standing for the rights of the Lithuanians and the Letts, which, in our mind, are unassailable, as clear as the rights of the Poles, Czecho-Slovaks, or the Jugo-Slavs.

"Lithuania had constituted itself as the grand duchy; the Letts were subjugated by the Teutons.

"Lithuania entered the Union of Lublin 1569, with Poland, by the authority of the King, against the protest of the representatives of the Nation. In 1562 even the Letts had come under the suzerainty of Lithuania and Poland.

"Lithuania remained an independent state, its relations to Poland can be compared to the relation of the Magyars to the Germans in Austria to-day: The Lithuanians maintained their highest dignitaries, their own administration, judiciary, and the Lithuanian statute, their own army and finances.

"Through the machinations of Prussia, Russia, and Austria, Poland and Lithuania were partitioned in 1772, 1793, and 1795. Russia has since then oppressed and persecuted the Lithuanians as well as the Poles most cruelly.

"In 1831, 1863, 1905 the Lithuanians sought their freedom, but were suppressed.

"In 1914 they were not guilty in the provocation of the world war, nor were they asked to give their consent to it; Lithuania became the battle field between the powers of Russia and Germany until at last, 1915 to 1917, Germany occupied Lithuania, Courland, and Livland; after the Brest-Litovsk treaty Esthonia and the district of Vitebek (the Lettgalls) were added to the territory occupied by Germany.

"In Europe the world war was advertised as the war for liberation of smaller and oppressed races and peoples. President Wilson, admitting the principle that 'the peace of the world should rest upon the rights of the peoples, not the rights of the governments' reply to Pope, August 27, 1917—pronounced that "no people must be forced under sovereignty under which it does not wish to live'—message to Russia, May 26, 1917.

"The Lithuanian army of 400,000 men had valiantly fought under Russia, and later, after the revolution demanded Lithuania's independence in several of the soldiers' conferences, 1917.

"The exiles and refugees in their conventions at Petrograd voiced nothing less than independence of Lithuania.

"Immigrants to the United States, citizens as well as noncitizens, in their conference in New York, Chicago, and so forth, stood up only for the emancipation of the Lithuanian nation from all foreign rule. The Lithuanian-Lettish republic is the generally recognized ideal.

"The Lithuanians in the territory occupied by Germany, in the convention of Vilnius, September, 1917, unanimously voted for the independence of Lithuania from all her neighbors—Russians, Poles, and Germans—and the National Council of Lithuania has declared Lithuania independent, February 16, 1918, and asked the recognition of independence by Russia, Germany, and other powers.

"Committees for independent Lithuania are working in Switzerland, Sweden, and Denmark.

"The congress of 22 nationalities of Russia, held in Kiev, September 8 to 16, 1917, acknowledged to the Lithuanians the right 'to the formation of its sovereign Lithuanian State out of districts of the Russian and Prussian Lithuania, and also of the Lithuanian parts of the district of Suvalkai.'

"That means a united Lithuania. Besides, the Lithuanians were first to promulgate the necessity of a confederation between the smaller, free, and democratic nations in the western belt of the previous Russian empire, in order to assure an effective barrier against the encroachments of Germany in the eastern Europe, as well as to make the Baltic Sea secure against the German hegemony, dreaded equally by all peoples living on its shores—Scandinavians and Poles, as well as Lithuanians and Letts, Esthonians and Finns.

"Already in 1914 and 1915 the Lithuanians in their conventions made it clear that the fate of the nation shall be decided only by the peace congress and not by separate powers, be it Russia or Germany.

"The Lithuanians in their conventions expressed their desire to enter the society of nations after the war, having as a nation clear conscience, since Lithuania has never broken her treaties nor has she ever considered treaties to be scraps of paper. Cases of broken treaties are unknown in Lithuania's history.

"If at the beginning of the war the Lithuanians inclined to be neutral toward their neighbors, since 1917, when the revolution broke out in Russia and when the United States entered the war, they decidedly sided with the entente. But Germany forced compacts on the national council of the occupied Lithuania, which compacts have no legal standing in the international law and shall be set aside by the peace congress.

"The Lithuanians were never barring the road to independence to the oppressed neighboring peoples and nations; they have always advocated the liberation of White Russia, Poland, Ukraine, Esthonia, Finland, Armenia, the various Slav races, and so forth. Their only desire was that these peoples shall not encroach upon the territory of their neighbors and disturb the national development of the smaller, downtrodden, and unawakened races or peoples.

"Under the circumstances, as set forth above, to compel the Lithuanians back into the embracement of Russian ochlocracy or into any other subjection can not mean the restoration of peace in Europe or make the peace secure for any length of time. On the contrary, the Balkans of eastern Europe will be established, since the Lithuanians are now determined either to get their independence or to perish. 'Now or never' is the slogan of the nation.

"We complain that diplomatic and political triumphs of the allies in the east are outclassed by the Germans. This is apt to happen as long as the allies are not outspoken for the independence of the smaller nations on the western belt of the previous Russian Empire.

"Why demoralize the people and break up their work, so wonderfully progressing under the most exacting conditions? Disregarding requisitions and military German oppression, the Lithuanians have established 2,500 common schools, more than 20 high schools; the University of Vilnius is being started this fall. Some 20,000 Lithuanian telegraphers, postmen, and the railroad men in Russia are well organized and awaiting for the opportunity to serve their mother country. Physicians, engineers, technicians, chemists, teachers are already on the spot to perform their duties, and the army under Gen. Klimaitis is waiting for a juncture with the allies' Murmansk expedition.

"These are facts, as far as we know them.

CONCLUSION.

"Senator LODGE, in our conviction, disagrees with President Wilson's principles on the liberation of races and nations. 'The vast importance of sustaining Russia' can only mean the ethnographical Russia, or Great Russia, as it is called. And a supplementary statement in this sense by Senator LODGE would remove a stone from the throbbing hearts of thousands of citizens and peoples who are devoted to liberty and democracy and to the cause of the allies.

"When even the Asiatic Syrians and the Armenians 'must be made safe,' why not the progressive Lithuanians and Letts, the oldest living race of the Indo-European family, who nowadays have to steer between the Scylla and Charybdis, the Russian ochlocracy and the German superman, the junker class?

"Give either liberty or death!

"For the executive of the Lithuanian National Council.

"JOHN SZLUPAS, M. D."

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. PENROSE introduced a bill (S. 4890) granting an increase of pension to Charles F. Doepel, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PROTECTION OF TRADE-MARKS.

Mr. FLETCHER. I introduced a bill known as Senate bill No. 4783, June 27, calendar day July 1. It was referred to the Committee on Commerce. The committee have held some hearings on the bill and now authorize me to report in lieu of that bill a committee bill, which I send to the desk and ask that it may be placed on the calendar.

The bill (S. 4889) to give effect to certain provisions of the convention for the protection of trade-marks and commercial names, made and signed in the city of Buenos Aires, in the Argentine Republic, August 20, 1910, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

STIMULATION OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. GORE. I desire to offer an amendment at this time which I intend at the proper time to offer to the pending unfinished business, being the food-production bill. I ask that it be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be the order.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4723) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

Mr. WALSH. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House, and request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. WALSH, Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota, and Mr. SMOOT conferees on the part of the Senate.

ANARCHISTIC ALIENS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is closed.

Mr. GORE. I wish to say for the information of the Senate that I shall move to take up the unfinished business at the close of the morning hour, and if we finish the bill I now move to take up before that time I shall ask for the consideration of the unfinished business before 2 o'clock.

I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12402) to exclude and expel from the United States aliens who are members of the anarchistic and similar classes.

Mr. SMOOT. Did I understand the Senator to say that he was going to move to take up the agricultural bill?

Mr. GORE. I shall move to take up the unfinished business at 2 o'clock, and will move to take it up before that time if the Senate disposes of the bill which I have already asked to have considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is in doubt whether the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma can be made in accordance with the unanimous-consent agreement. The Senator, however, can ask unanimous consent to take up the bill, the Chair thinks.

Mr. SMOOT. I am going to object. I want the unanimous-consent agreement carried out, and after the morning business to-day the only thing to be considered is House bill 11945.

Mr. GORE. Before the Senator makes his objection finally I should like to say to him that the bill which I ask to have considered is a bill authorizing the deportation of alien enemies. I brought it up on three different occasions, and I think the objections were explained away. The department is extremely anxious to have the measure passed. They say they are annoyed by these people; that they have no power to dispose of them at this time; and it is a source of infinite annoyance. It is at the urgent instance of the department that I am seeking to take up the matter.

I will say further to the Senator that, in order further to eliminate the objections which have been heretofore suggested, I intend to move an amendment limiting the operation of the bill to the period of the war.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection at all to the bill, but I know that there are some Senators here who are remaining in the city to-day in order that they may vote upon House bill 11945. I will say that I do not believe it is going to take very long to dispose of that bill. Let us get it out of the way, and then I shall be perfectly willing to assist the Senator from Oklahoma in passing his bill to-day before we adjourn.

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senator from Utah that I do not think it is possible to dispose of the bill to which he refers to-day.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the bill will pass this body to-day.

Mr. GORE. I do not think it will.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, we can try it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that, under the terms of the unanimous-consent agreement, the only business which can be considered, except when it is temporarily laid aside, is House bill 11945.

STIMULATION OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oklahoma asks that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11945) to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purposes of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendment is that of the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN].

Mr. TOWNSEND and Mr. CURTIS. Let the amendment be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 11, after the numerals $6,100,000, it is proposed to strike out the remainder of the paragraph and to insert the following:

That after December 31, 1918, until the conclusion of the present war, for the purpose of conserving the man power of the Nation and to increase efficiency in the production of arms, war munitions, ships, food, and clothing for the Army and Navy, it shall be unlawful to sell for beverage purposes any distilled spirits, and during said time no distilled spirits held in bond shall be removed therefrom for beverage purposes except for export. After November 1, 1918, until the conclusion of the present war, no grain, cereal, fruit, or other food product shall be used in the manufacture or production of beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquor for beverage purposes. After December 31, 1918, until the conclusion of the present war, no beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquor shall be sold for beverage purposes except for export. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue is hereby authorized and directed to prescribe rules and regulations subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, in regard to the removal of distilled spirits held in bond after December 31, 1918, for other than beverage purposes, also in regard to the sale and distribution of wine for sacramental, medicinal, or other nonbeverage uses. After the approval of this act no distilled, malt, vinous, or other intoxicating liquors shall be imported into the United States.

Any person who violates any of the foregoing provisions shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I do not understand what the amendment of the Senator from California is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary has just stated it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That sounds like the amendment proposed by the committee. I should like to know what change the Senator from California proposes to make in the amendment of the committee.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I understood the amendment which was just read by the Secretary was the amendment which was before the Senate when it last had this measure under consideration.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Did the Senator from California reintroduce it?

Mr. PHELAN. This is the old amendment of July 8, 1918. At the time of adjournment—the recess agreement—I had two amendments, I think, on the desk extending the date.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California, as the Chair understands, has taken the floor to reply to a question of the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to ask a further question. I hold in my hand a printed amendment reported by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] to the bill. As I understand, that was, in effect, substituted in the bill for the amendment originally proposed by the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Washington is right. As a matter of fact, I think the RECORD will show that the amendment which he holds in his hand, a committee amendment, was in fact substituted by the Senate for the amendment as printed in the bill; so that the amendment as printed in the bill really is not the amendment which has been agreed to, because another amendment was substituted for it by the action of the committee, whose action was concurred in by the Senate before we entered upon the recess program. So the pending amendment is really the amendment of the Senator from California to the amendment reported by the committee, which is printed in amendment form but which has not been printed in the bill, the bill not having been reprinted, I presume. Therefore the amendment does not appear in the bill itself, but it has been substituted for the committee amendment, which begins on line 21 of the bill itself and ends at the bottom of page 7. I believe the RECORD will bear me out in that regard, that such action was formally taken by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that, upon inquiry of the Secretary, he is informed that the pending amendment is that of the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN]; the Secretary confirms that statement now. But the Secretary will, by direction of the Chair, state the amendment regarding which the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] made inquiry.

The SECRETARY. Mr. PHELAN proposes to strike out, on page 2, line 2, the word "fruit"; on the same page, line 3, to strike out the word "wine"; on line 4 to strike out the words "or vinous"; on line 6 to strike out the word "wine"; and on line 7 the words "or vinous."

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think that gives me the information which I desire. The Senator from California takes the committee amendment and proposes certain amendments to it.

Mr. NORRIS. That is right, Mr. President; but the Secretary did not read the proper amendment. The Secretary read the amendment that is in the bill. As a matter of fact, that was changed by action of the Senate, a committee amendment printed in regular amendment form having been substituted by the Senate upon the recommendation of the committee for the amendment which was read by the Secretary.

Mr. PHELAN. I ask that the Secretary read the amendment which has been adopted.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from California made his motion properly, and it is the pending motion, I think, without any doubt; but it applies, as the very reading of it will show, to the committee amendment printed in regular amendment form and not to the one which was printed in the bill itself, which, as I have said, was changed by the action of the Senate and another amendment substituted for it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, the amendment to which the Senator from Nebraska refers is the one which reads:

That after June, 1919, * * * for the purpose of conserving the man power and to increase the efficiency in the production of arms, war munitions—

And so forth.

Mr. NORRIS. No, Mr. President; the Senator is in error.

Mr. VARDAMAN. That, though, is the amendment offered by the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. No; that amendment was offered by the committee and was printed in the bill, but another amendment was substituted for it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. It is in the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. It is in the printed bill now, but before the Senate agreed upon the recess plan in July the committee reported another amendment, which was adopted in its stead. There has been no reprint of the bill, and hence the amendment which has been adopted is not formally printed in the bill. That amendment was printed in regular amendment form and was agreed to by the Senate and substituted for the one that is in the bill.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Well, the amendment to which the Senator has reference and is holding in his hand is the one that does not begin to conserve the man power and increase the efficiency of the manufacture of war munitions, and so forth, until a year from now?

Mr. NORRIS. No; the Senator is not right. It is the one that begins as follows:

That after December 31, 1918, and until the conclusion of the present war—

And so forth.

That amendment is not printed in the bill.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Is that the amendment of the committee presented yesterday?

Mr. NORRIS. That is the amendment the committee reported before we agreed upon the recess plan.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Do I understand that to be the amendment the committee reported yesterday?

Mr. NORRIS. The committee did not report any amendment yesterday.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I thought they did.

Mr. NORRIS. No. There has been some kind of an agreement about a substitute even for the amendment which has been agreed to; but the parliamentary situation is that before we agreed to the recess plan we took out of the bill the amendment that is printed in the bill, the one which the Secretary read, and substituted for it another one which the committee reported. That amendment is now printed in amendment form and begins as I have indicated. So what is printed in the bill is not now the committee amendment. That amendment has been taken out. The amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] shows on its face that that is right, because if you will listen to its reading you will see that it refers to words, lines, and pages, that do not correspond at all if tried to be applied to the printed bill. He applies it, and properly so, to the pending amendment of the committee which was substituted for the one printed in the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator a moment ago alluded to some agreement which possibly has been reached involving another change.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Can the Senator inform us whether that agreement has been arrived at and what the proposed change is?

Mr. NORRIS. I will not undertake to inform the Senator in detail as to that, because I think the proposed amendment is going to be offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD]. It is an amendment that the committee has not acted upon and which has no parliamentary standing here now, as it has never been offered, as a matter of fact.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The purpose of my inquiry, if I may be permitted, is to indicate that it is quite useless for the Senate to proceed to discuss that portion of the bill which just now is contained only in the printed amendment and to compare that with the provision which is actually printed in the bill if, after we discuss that a while, another suggestion is put forward under some kind of an agreement entered into by those who propose this legislation.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, let me explain to the Senator that there is not anything irregular about it. There has not been a reprint of the bill, and that is the reason why the amendment, which has been agreed to by the Senate in place of the one that was in the bill, is not printed in the bill. That amendment, however, is before the Senate; it is subject to amendment under the parliamentary situation, and the Senator from California has offered an amendment to it. Now, it will be perfectly proper, as we proceed, for some Senator to offer a substitute for it. I do not intend to offer one, but I understand that such a substitute will be offered as has been agreed on by many Members of the Senate. That substitute has not been brought up yet, but I understand that is going to be done.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I am not contending that there has been any irregularity.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. NORRIS. I thought I had the floor and yielded to the Senator from New York.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then, to whom does the Senator from Nebraska yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield to the Senator from New York first, and then I will yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. PHELAN. I thought I had the floor, but I will yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Let me say to the Senator from Nebraska that I am not contending that there is any irregularity about the printing of this particular amendment, nor that the parliamentary situation has become impossible or will become impossible, but I think, nevertheless, there will arise a mental confusion here in the Senate if the amendment now proposed by the Senator from California, which is the pending amendment for discussion, applies to one committee amendment when shortly thereafter another amendment is going to be offered, to which the amendment of the Senator from California will be inapplicable and which will require that it be redrafted in order to harmonize.

Mr. NORRIS. That happens often in the case of bills under consideration; but there is not any parliamentary way that I know of to prevent the Senator from California from offering an amendment to the amendment pending. So we have, then, this situation: There is a committee amendment, namely, the one printed in amendment form—and it would be just as good in the parliamentary sense if it had not been printed in that form—which the RECORD shows has been agreed to and substituted for the other amendment in the bill. Now, the Senator from California, and any other Senator, has the right to offer an amendment to the substitute, and then another substitute amendment can be offered. It may create some difficulties, as the Senator says, in the mental processes of Senators, but it is something that frequently happens in the consideration of bills, and is not contrary to the rule.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I merely ask the Senator from Texas, if he has an amendment to offer, to offer it now so that we will know where we start.

Mr. NORRIS. Even if the Senator from Texas offers his substitute now, the amendment of the Senator from California to perfect the text would have precedence over it, and if there is any confusion the offering of another amendment would only add to it. I yield now to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I was under the impression that the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] had the floor and I was going to suggest to the Senator from New York that when the Senator from Texas could get the floor after the Senator from California was through that he was prepared to propose a substitute; but, of course, that he can not do while the Senator from California has the floor. Apparently the Senator from California has not the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendment is that offered by the Senator from California.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, in order to clear the parliamentary situation, I withdraw my amendment in order that the substitute to be offered by the Senator from Texas may be presented at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from California is withdrawn.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, before making a statement regarding this matter I desire to read two communications to the Senate, one from the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, the other from the Anti-Saloon League of America:

NATIONAL WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION,
August 27, 1918.

Senator MORRIS SHEPPARD,
United States Senate:

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union, with its more than half a million members, has championed war prohibition because of a deep conviction that it would help win the war. This conviction is based upon statements from high Government officials and expert authorities studying conservation of food, fuel, man power, and transportation facilities.

In a recent report from the National Coal Association it is emphatically stated that national prohibition during the period of the war is absolutely neccessary to make effective any other plan for increased coal production. Following this comes a proclamation from the President of the United States declaring "the existing scarcity of coal is creating a grave danger, in fact, the most serious which confronts us." In view of these and other startling facts, we, as patriots and mothers of the boys who are in service, and whose younger sons are soon to be called, would not be true to our flag without making a last appeal to you to enact a law for war prohibition to be effective not later than January 1, 1919.

LENNA LOWE YOST,
Legislative Representatives.

The other letter is as follows:

NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE,
THE ANTI-SALOON LEAGUE OF AMERICA,
Washington, D. C., August 27, 1918.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: The case for war-time prohibition has been won at the bar of public opinion. The masses of the people believe in it and urge it a real necessity in this emergency.

It would "speed up" every industry which is essential to the winning of the war—food, coal, munitions, and ships. The production of all these prime war needs would be largely increased by the early adoption of nation-wide prohibition. The people believe this; the experience with prohibition where it has been tried justifies the belief.

The testimony from the shipyards and mines confirms the statements from industrial plants located in prohibition territory throughout the country. Nor can it be successfully denied that prohibition makes for maximum production and highest efficiency in every line.

We are asked—in fact, compelled—to conserve foods and deny ourselves what would not hurt but help us; we are urged to save coal in view of the horrible conditions the country faced last winter and in prospect during the next. We urge our people to buy bonds, but the Nation's direct expenditures for intoxicating liquors for less than five years would buy all the liberty loan issues we have floated in our three great drives. With three years' liquor expenditures we could absorb the next call of six billions and buy as many war-savings stamps as have so far been sold since the war.

We have advocated war-time prohibition solely because we believe in ways that have been specifically mentioned, and in untold ways as well, its adoption will not only help win the war but help win it quick. Nation-wide prohibition is coming by the process of constitutional amendment within the next year and a half, but we need its benefits in this emergency.

A war-time prohibition measure has been before Congress for more than a year. In fact, it was actually adopted by the House of Representatives in June, 1917, and the provision in that measure, as far as it related to beer and wine, was eliminated in the Senate for reasons well known to Senators. Since that time the sentiment for war-time prohibition has been growing by leaps and bounds. The brewers and liquor dealers have continued to waste fuel and food needed for war purposes. Transportation facilities and man power have been crippled by this useless and harmful traffic.

We have asked the Congress for immediate national prohibition as representatives of our church and temperance constituency throughout the country. We have given the facts; we have made no misstatements to achieve success; we have made no threats; our constituency will continue to be as intensely loyal to our country's cause in this conflict as they have been from the beginning, though they will be deeply grieved if Congress and the Executive should fail to respond to this plea of the best citizenship of the Nation at this time.

The liquor interests are pleading for unreasonable delay. Every other interest is subordinated to the winning of the war. The Congress is asked to treat this condemned traffic as having rights superior to other business and as too sacred to be disturbed, even when we are face to face with the greatest crisis of time.

The Comptroller of the Currency has refuted the claims of financial ruin as a result of immediate war prohibition, and has stated that six months would be ample time even to make commercial readjustments. On the other hand, from the standpoint of the present emergency, the reasons are very strong why it should become immediately effective. There is no compelling necessity for the revenues derivable from intoxicating liquors. The liquor traffic yielded considerably less than $500,000,000 in revenue last year, and they collected that from the people who, in the last analysis, always pay the taxes, and who are willing to raise and pay the needful money to win this war without dependence upon a criminal and debauching traffic that unfits our people both for war and for peace.

We feel also that ample provision should be made for continuing the prohibition during the period of demobilization, which may be quite as important as during actual hostilities.

We feel that we have done our full duty. We have pleaded for action. We have asked for immediate, emergency prohibition not only as a means of winning the war but winning it quick, and thus conserving thousands of lives of our brave boys and billions of our Nation's money. The responsibility for delay—if unreasonable time is given the traffic—is not upon us. If the country shivers with cold next winter, the old and the young and the sickly die from lack of heat; if we fail to keep our men overseas supplied promptly with food and clothing and arms and munitions, either from lack of coal or steel or ships or labor to produce and transport them, the responsibility is not upon us.

We hope you will use your influence to have the war-prohibition measure go into effect at the earliest possible date consistent with justice to all concerned, and we will appreciate it if you will communicate to the Senate the sentiments herein expressed.

With much respect, we are,
Yours, sincerely,

Mr. President, I have prepared an amendment or a substitute which I believe represents the best that can be done in a matter that presents many difficulties. I submit this substitute to the Senate with the hope that it will aid in solving the question now before us. That question is as to the date on which the prohibition amendment to the emergency Agricultural appropriation bill shall become effective.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I was going to suggest to the Senator that before he makes his statement with reference to it he have the substitute read. I know that there are several Senators who are anxious to know what the substance of the substitute is.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I was about to make the same suggestion.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I intended to have it read after I made the statement, but in view of the suggestion of the Senators I ask that it be read now.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I suggest to the Senator from Texas that he present it as a substitute and have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the proposed substitute.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, this is a motion to strike out and insert, I suppose?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will ascertain from the Secretary what the provision is.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to substitute the following:

That after June 30, 1919, until the conclusion of the present war, and thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President of the United States, for the purpose of conserving the man power of the Nation and to increase efficiency in the production of arms, munitions, ships, food, and clothing for the Army and Navy, it shall be unlawful to sell for beverage purposes any distilled spirits, and during said time no distilled spirits held in bond shall be removed therefrom for beverage purposes except for export. After May 1, 1919, until the conclusion of the present war, and thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President of the United States, no grains, cereals, fruit, or other food product shall be used in the manufacture or production of beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquor for beverage purposes. After June 30, 1919, until the conclusion of the present war, and thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President of the United States, no beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquor shall be sold for beverage purposes except for export. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue is hereby authorized and directed to prescribe rules and regulations, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, in regard to the removal of distilled spirits held in bond after June 30, 1919, until this act shall cease to operate, for other than beverage purposes; also in regard to the sale and distribution of wine for sacramental, medicinal, or other than beverage uses. After the approval of this act no distilled, malt, vinous, or other intoxicating liquors shall be imported into the United States during the continuance of the present war and period of demobilization.

Any person who violates any of the foregoing provisions shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding one year or by fine not exceeding $1,000, or by both such imprisonment and fine.

Provided, That the President of the United States be, and hereby is, authorized and empowered, at any time after the passage of this act, to establish zones of such size as he may deem advisable about coal mines, munition factories, shipbuilding plants, and such other plants for war material as may seem to him to require such action, whenever in his opinion the creation of such zones is necessary to, or advisable in, the proper prosecution of the war, and that he is hereby authorized and empowered to prohibit the sale, manufacture, or distribution of intoxicating liquors in such zones, and that any violation of the President's regulations in this regard shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year or by fine of not more than $1,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Provided, however, That nothing in this act shall be construed to interfere with the power conferred upon the President by section 15 of the food-control act approved August 10, 1917 (Pub. No. 40, 65th Cong.).

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, this amendment establishes complete war-time prohibition, and is the final measure of a series of war prohibition measures already adopted.

What are the war prohibition measures already in operation? Soon after America's entrance into the present struggle a law was passed forbidding the sale of intoxicating liquors to anyone in the uniform of the Army or Navy, and authorizing the President to establish prohibition zones around military camps, cantonments, and so forth. These zones have been established. Later, the manufacture of distilled liquors during the war was prohibited, and the President was given authority to diminish the alcoholic content of malt and vinous liquors, or to stop their manufacture altogether, as in his judgment might seem desirable. He was also given power to commandeer distilled liquors already in existence.

Under the authority conferred on him the President this year limited the amount of grain to be used in making beer to 70 per cent of the amount used in 1917, and has limited the alcoholic content of beer to 2¾ per cent. He has also limited the amount of barley to be used in brewing beer.

Furthermore, an amendment to the Federal Constitution for nation-wide prohibition was submitted to the States by Congress before the close of 1917, and will in all probability be ratified by the middle of 1919, and in operation by the middle of 1920, at the latest. In addition, let it be said that prohibition by State and local action is already in operation in more than four-fifths of all the territory of the United States, and that this prohibition area contains more than two-thirds of the American people.

It is the conviction of the Committee on Agriculture, and I believe of a majority of the Senate and House of Representatives, as well as of the American people, that the time has arrived when there should be complete war-time prohibition at the earliest practicable moment. The President is in sympathy with a measure of this kind, provided sufficient time may be had for necessary adjustments. The Committee on Agriculture, which held hearings on this subject, has at different times reached different conclusions as to what will be a sufficient period. The great temperance and prohibition organizations want the measure at the earliest practicable date. Various Senators have suggested different periods.

The various periods thus suggested ranged from three months to one year and even a year and a half after the passage of the bill. The President thought that a year would be needed. Representatives of the grape growers, the wine makers, owners of distilled liquors, and of the financial interests involved appeared before the Committee on Agriculture and insisted on a year and a half as a minimum. After presenting the situation to a number of Senators on both sides of the question—I regret that there was not time to see them all—I found the consensus of opinion to be that June 30, 1919, was the earliest practicable date. In order, however, that no possible emergency might be overlooked a clause has been added to the amendment giving the President authority at any time after the passage of the act to establish prohibition zones about coal mines, munition factories, shipbuilding plants, and such other plants for war material as may seem to him to require such action whenever, in his opinion, such step is necessary to or advisable in the proper prosecution of the war. A clause has also been added making it clear that the President's existing authority over wines, beer, and whisky is in no way interfered with.

With this brief statement, I present the substitute for the careful consideration of the Senate as representing the consensus of opinion of friends and opponents of the original proposition as to the most practicable action that could be taken under the circumstances.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Can the Senator state the amount of grain that can be manufactured into beer per month now?

Mr. SHEPPARD. The total yearly amount is between forty and fifty million bushels, as I am informed.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I should like to have the Senator give me the benefit of his opinion on this question: It is stated in the amendment that for the conservation of man power, to encourage the building of ships, and to strengthen our forces generally the manufacture of beer is to stop after the 1st of May, 1919. If it will conserve man power to stop it next year, why will it not conserve man power to stop it now?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It will. That is true. We had to arrive at some time, however, and practically everybody thought that some time should elapse between the passage of the act and the beginning of its operation.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If it is a war measure what reason has anybody ever given for the length of time which is stated in the amendment?

Mr. SHEPPARD. The main reason given by the President was the prevention of financial disturbances that might result from too sudden liquidation of the immense amount of bank paper that is in existence with beverages as security.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Is one of the reasons given that a tax upon it will be needed in order to raise revenue?

Mr. SHEPPARD. No; that reason was not advanced.

Mr. President, I have received a letter on this subject from the American Hotel Association. I know it is on the other side of this proposition, but I believe it is but fair that it should be read. I have read letters on our side of the question, and I am going to read this for the information of the Senate in order to show the Senate the different views that have been presented:

AMERICAN HOTEL ASSOCIATION OF THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA,
Chicago, Ill., August 29, 1918.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,
United States Senator, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The members and officers of the American Hotel Association of the United States, to the number of 96, in meeting assembled at the Willard Hotel, representing approximately 8,000 hotels and giving employment to hundreds of thousands of citizens, and also investments running into the billions, unanimously resolved that they earnestly pray your honorable body to consider the date for the application of war-time prohibition to begin on January 1, 1920.

The necessities for this extension of time are many and seriously imperil the successful operation of the hotel business of the country, for the reason that we can not dispose of our large and valuable stocks of wines and liquors now on hand, which have taken long years to acquire and possess, and which can not be disposed of in a few short months by any system of merchandising now known to the trade.

With the great loss of revenues incident to prohibition, the hotel keeper is confronted with grave financial responsibilities accruing from leasehold contracts already existing under present business conditions. Any abridgement of present incomes and revenues will render the leaseholder unable to meet his obligations and thus practically destroy a now prosperous business which has been established under Federal and State licenses and regulations.

For your information we attach a copy of petition and resolutions of the American Hotel Association, which were widely distributed among 56 hotel associations throughout the country, and also among bankers, insurance companies, real estate boards, and other business organizations. These resolutions have been approved by the signatures of thousands of petitioners, which petitions we have here ready to be presented to you and your confreres if so desired.

Respectfully submitted.

W. N ROBINSON,
President.
E. M. TIERNEY,
Vice President.
J. K. BLATCHFORD,
Secretary.

AUGUST 14, 1918.

To the PRESIDENT, SENATE, AND HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES:

The undersigned are opposed to any further legislation prohibiting the sale of liquors during the period of the war. We believe that this question has already and very wisely been left to the sound judgment of President Wilson, and we also believe that additional legislation of this kind will be an irreparably disturbing influence to both capital and labor, thereby seriously interfering with the successful prosecution of the war.

Yours, respectfully,

GARLAND SABIG.
President Guaranty Trust Co. of New York.

RESOLUTIONS PROPOSED BY THE AMERICAN HOTEL ASSOCIATION.

The Pennsylvania National Bank (here fill in the name of hotel association, real estate organization, board of trade, chamber of commerce, retail merchants' association, bank, or whatever institution or association as shall be appropriate) respectfully submits to the President and Congress of the United States as follows:

That this association and the members thereof have from the day war was declared given their utmost assistance, cooperation, and labors to the furtherance of each and every measure and regulation tending to bring about a successful conclusion of the war. The labors and record of this association and its members for over a year speak louder than any words we could use of our intense loyalty, patriotism, and overwhelming desire to contribute substantially to the vigorous prosecution of the war in all of its phases, regardless of any self-denial or hardship which may be imposed thereby.

That this association and the members thereof hereby formally pledge themselves to continue in ever-increasing measure the labors and efforts which they have expended in the past in cooperating and assisting in war work.

That this association and its members unreservedly approve and uphold all measures and regulations tending toward the successful prosecution of the war.

That this association and its members have not only given the most careful, unbiased thought and consideration to the pending prohibition amendment to the emergency Agricultural appropriation bill now pending in Congress, but have also exhaustively investigated and inquired as to the attitude and opinion of the substantial members of this community.

That as a result of such investigation, inquiry, and consideration we are absolutely of the opinion that the enactment of such prohibition legislation, far from assisting in the successful prosecution of the war, will not only cause dissension and unrest among our people but because of its disastrous effect upon real estate values, upon financial institutions, upon business generally, and upon the confidence of the common people of this country, will cause irreparable and immeasurable harm to the unified, patriotic, and successful cooperation among all the people of the United States, which is essential to the carrying on of the war.

Believing as we do, and bearing in mind the action of Congress with respect to legislation covering similar subjects (for example, the Food Administration legislation), it is our sincere hope and earnest desire, inasmuch as the President already has full power to restrict, limit, or prohibit the manufacture and sale of alcoholic beverages in any locality which it shall appear to him to be wise, expedient, or necessary, that the subject matter of the prohibition legislation now pending before Congress be likewise left to the sound discretion and wisdom of the President, in whose judgment, intelligence, courage, and patriotism this association and every member thereof has the utmost and absolutely unqualified confidence.

And finally, we desire formally and officially to pledge this association and its members to a complete, loyal, and whole-hearted acquiescence in whatever action the President shall be authorized and take with respect to this or any other measure which shall be deemed necessary and expedient for the best interests of the country at large.

That copies of the foregoing be forwarded by the officers of this association to the President and the Congress of the United States.

Dated at Pottsville, Pa., August 24, 1918.

THE PENNSYLVANIA NATIONAL BANK,
By FRANK D. YUENGLING, President.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I take it that that did not appeal to the Senator.

Mr. SHEPPARD. It did not appeal to me, because I am not willing to consent to any longer time than June 30, 1919. Indeed, I would favor a far earlier date if I believed it could be enacted finally into law.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas has just stated that it is the consensus of opinion that June 30 of next year—1919—be the day agreed upon both by the friends and opponents of the measure on which it shall be unlawful to sell vinous, malt, or spirituous liquors. I have been very much interested in this discussion, and I have not been consulted. So I am not a part of that consensus. The hotel men, in the letter which has just been read, ask that it be made January 1, 1920. The President of the United States, according to the speech just made by the Senator from Texas, said that a year's time ought to be allowed in which to dispose of the stocks of wines and liquors.

I, therefore, would like to ask the Senator from Texas how the consensus was made up, and who, on behalf of the wine industry, for instance, agreed that June 30 of next year would be any relief at all.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Of course, I did not mean to say that it was the unanimous opinion, but the Representative from California [Mr. KAHN], when he appeared before our committee, gave October 1 of this year as an acceptable time.

Mr. PHELAN. Then I must understand from the Senator that the consensus, so far as it relates to the wine men, is the opinion of Congressman KAHN, of California?

Mr. SHEPPARD. He appeared there as the representative of the wine industry, and I so understood it, and I think the committee understood it that way. I do not want to misrepresent anyone.

Mr. PHELAN. I am doing no injustice to the Representative from California [Mr. KAHN] when I state that he represents, being a Congressman from an urban district, not the grape growers, nor does he pretend to represent the grape growers, but the manufacturers of wines. Of course, if the grape growers are not allowed to crush the grapes on the vines to-day and make another vintage the manufacturers of wine are not much concerned, because in the State of California there is a very large corporation—the California Wine Association—that does all that work, and if no more wine is put on the market they would have an increased demand for their large supplies on hand.

Therefore, we must distinguish, Mr. President, between the grape growers and the wine manufacturers. I doubt that the wine manufacturers are interested in projecting the date too far in advance; and it is a grave question whether the wine manufacturers will manufacture this year's crop if the substitute offered by the Senator prevails, because they would not only have to make the wine but they would have to dispose of it, and they have the power, I regret to say, and I know no law that could compel them otherwise, to refuse to manufacture into wine this year's crop. So the wine grower is in a better position to be crushed than the grape.

This matter has all been explained to the committee by a gentleman from California representing the wine growers, the executive officer of the California State Viticultural Commission, charged by the State with the duty of conserving that industry, and Mr. Hiliary Welch, of Lodi, Cal., representing a very extensive wine district, and the bankers of California as well. They were appointed at a general assembly of the grape growers. They have given accurate information to the committee of which the Senator from Texas is a most deserving member. They stated yesterday that the time in the substitute—June 30, 1919—within which all the wines would have to be disposed of was of no value to them whatever, because it is impossible to take this year's crop upon the vines, now ripe for the picking, and make wine out of it and dispose of it within that time. They can make the wine, but they can not dispose of it.

I may say here in passing that every grape grower has two stocks on hand, last year's and this year's stock. That has been shown by the report of the Internal-Revenue Department, which made an extensive inventory of the wine, malt, and liquor interests of the country. They have reported the exact amounts on hand of wines, beers, and liquors. All the wine men have two stocks on hand after the crushing of this year's crop. They have last year's and they have this year's. That means that it would be utterly impossible for them to dispose by June 30 next of the crop of this year and the crop of last year.

It is no relief, therefore, to the wine men. I do not know why the Senator states that it is the general consensus of opinion that June 30, 1919, would be a fair compromise, when the President of the United States says that these men can not dispose of their stocks within that time, when every California wine grower says so, when only interested parties in the manufacture of wines, having stocks on hand, raise a question, and then in a qualified way. So it is creating a wrong impression in the Senate for the Senator from Texas to say that there has been any agreement upon that subject so far as the wine growers are concerned.

I have here a tabulation of figures showing the wines produced to June 30, 1918, and the wine on hand July 1, 1918, which verifies what I said as to the conclusions of the Internal-Revenue Department. I ask that it be inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement referred to is as follows, and was prepared by Mr. E. M. Sheehan, executive officer of the California Viticultural Commission:

	Dry.	Sweet.	Total.
Wines on hand in United States in bonded premises Sept. 8, 1916, just before the vintage or wine-making season	Gallons. 19,441,564	Gallons. 12,758,690	Gallons. 32,200,254
Wines produced Sept. 8, 1916, to June 30, 1917	23,976,872	17,740,111	41,716,983
Wines on hand July 1, 1917	22,969,250	18,637,736	41,606,986
Wine produced July 1, 1917, to June 30, 1918	33,501,990	14,341,195	47,843,185
Wine on hand July 1, 1918	24,374,271	17,388,400	41,762,671

These figures taken from official data submitted by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue justify the accuracy of a statement that at the close of each vintage season after the wine grape crop is made into wine, there are in bonded premises throughout the country two years' supply of wine, and that during the year following the vintage season and until the next season arrives, one year's production has been tax paid and disposed of.

It is therefore safe to say that if you propose to stop the sale of wine after June 1, 1919, you not alone prevent the disposition of the old crop of wine on hand, but you make it entirely out of the possibilities to dispose of the crop of grapes of this season now hanging on the vines ready for harvest next month, the value of which to the vineyardists approximates $14,000,000, and you destroy Government revenue in an equal amount on the product of one single season. It takes time to prepare and put wine on the market and have the market absorb it.

These official figures are conclusive evidence that if you would not knowingly destroy at the opening of the harvest season an agricultural industry that this Government has fostered and is now fostering, you must not curtail the sale of domestic wines until at least July 1, 1920.

By drastic action you do by far greater harm to the producers than to the wineries. The latter can refuse to make wine and sell only what is on hand, at a full profit; but the unfortunate vineyardist finds himself with a fresh crop of grapes on hand, and no sale for them—a crop on which he has already spent $40 per acre in cultivating and for which he realizes nothing, besides being out a year's labor.

Mr. PHELAN. Now, Mr. President, the schedule which I have given shows exactly what I have said, that these wine growers have two crops on hand when the crop of 1918 is harvested, and therefore it is impossible for them to make the new crop and sell the stock on hand and the stock which they will necessarily have by the making of the new vintage within the time limit. They are in this precarious position, I wish to repeat, that they have no facilities for making wine. The making of the wine is in the hands of the California Wine Association, which may refuse to manufacture the product. I may be doing an injustice to the California Wine Association, now liquidating its affairs, which has been cooperating in this legislation, and I only mentioned it because the name of the Representative from California, my friend Mr. KAHN, was introduced.

I see in the testimony here, which verifies the statement of the Senator from Texas, that Mr. KAHN thought that four months' time would be sufficient, but what he clearly had in mind was the taking of the crop off the vines within four months' time and nothing else. In fact, it would not require four months' time from to-day. That testimony was given last July. The picking of the grapes is now about to be made in California, and before November 1 the crop will be harvested, but the problem is then for these unfortunate people who are in grave peril by threatened legislation what to do with a crop valued at $15,000,000, the largest crop ever harvested in California, and the largest crop because they pruned their vines not for the perpetuity of the vine and its health but for the purpose of getting the maximum yield, realizing the fact that national prohibition is imminent.

They concede the prophecies made by the gentlemen of the Agricultural Committee that in the spring or not later than the summer of 1920 the prohibition amendment will be in full force and effect. That is to say, it is the belief and the prophecy of these gentlemen of the Agricultural Committee that the constitutional amendment will prevail by having received the ratification of 36 States in the spring of 1919, and by its own provision it will not go into effect until one year later than that. Therefore, it is safe to agree with these gentlemen that there shall be national prohibition, country-wide, dry as a bone, in the spring of 1920, and why torment these people, who are looking the utter extinction of their industry in the face? What is the meaning of this flare-up of war prohibition? It is simply this, that when you have your opponent going it is the time to follow up your advantage. I have read in a prohibition organ, "Go while the going is good." It is not a humane or Christian sentiment, but that is the spirit in which this war prohibition is proposed, because these gentlemen know they will have accomplished their dearest desires in the spring of 1920, and now they desire to rub in, war to the knife and the knife to the hilt, at the expense of their opponent who admits that he is beaten and helpless—a most Christian and humane attitude for Christian gentlemen preaching honesty and morality.

I will digress to say that I find on my desk a telegram from the distinguished divine, Dr. Parkhurst. It is the only testimony I have to offset the telegrams which have been read into the RECORD this morning from church societies. We can produce much evidence from scientific societies and from civic bodies, but we have very little testimony to submit from church societies. So it interests me to find this telegram which I will read. Says Dr. C. H. Parkhurst:

NEW YORK, October 20, 1914.

A. SBARBORO, Esq.,
San Francisco:

I am amazed at the possible prohibitory action of California touching the matter of the manufacture, sale, and transportation of wine. Such action would be a short-sighted contribution to the cause of sound and wholesome temperance.

People are going to drink, and they are going to drink something that has a measure of stimulus in it, and to let them drink light wines is one of the surest means of preventing their drinking heavy whisky. I know that from having lived in wine producing countries, where wine is freely used by old and young, and intoxication exceedingly rare.

Tying a man up too strongly in sumptuary matters means that in course of time he will break his bonds and the last estate of that man will be worse than the first.

That is a sort of a prediction of a revulsion of feeling, a revolution against restraint. He adds:

It is un-American and immoral to dictate to a man what his conduct shall be in matters that are not intrinsically evil.

C. H. PARKHURST.

That telegram is addressed to Mr. A. Sbarboro, of San Francisco, and is signed by Dr. C. H. Parkhurst. He believes that light wines and beers prevent hard drinking and speaks from his personal observation and knowledge as a reformer and moral teacher.

I was referring to the statement of Mr. KAHN, and I observed that coming from an urban district, where there are no grape growers, he necessarily must speak in behalf of the wine manufacturers.

The attorney of the California Wine Association, my friend, Mr. Oscar Sutro, telegraphed me this last July, when the matter was up for consideration, and which may serve to explain the attitude of that corporation, as follows:

Jones amendment allows no opportunity to complete liquidation of wine industry or to dispose of growing crops. Vineyard cultivation this year cost more than $10,000,000; I think will all be lost if proposed legislation enacted. Anticipating national prohibition, wine industry in this State is now in liquidation. Transportation and sale of existing wine stocks, consisting mainly of sweet wines with low alcohol content, should be permitted in any event, even if further manufacture prohibited. More than half a million dollars in fortifying taxes was paid last year to the Federal Government to preserve wines, which Jones amendment would now confiscate. Amendment would also confiscate thousands of tons of grapes useful for no other purpose. There is no food conservation in Jones amendment, since wine grapes are not food. For fuel tonnage and food-conservation purposes, there is no more reason for legislating against grapes and wines than against nonalcoholic beverages which require as much if not more foodstuffs, fuel, and transportation tonnage.

OSCAR SUTRO.

The original Jones amendment to which Mr. Sutro refers reduces the time within which wine might be manufactured and sold to January 1, 1919, as I understand the Jones amendment. So the attitude of the California Wine Association, the large monopoly in the manufacture of all wines in California, having absorbed all the smaller concerns, is not in favor of limiting the time for which I plead for the distribution of wine. They have large stocks on hand, and logically they would be in favor of the extension of time for the sale of the product. So Mr. KAHN must have had in mind not the sale but the harvesting of the crop.

If this legislation prevails and the time for sale is limited to June 30, 1919, this corporation will have a clear way of some eight or nine months in which to dispose of their entire stock, and they may be able to do it; and anyone speaking for them would not enter serious objections to the proposal of the Senator from Texas; but what of the men who have their grapes now upon the vines, which they have to manufacture into wine in order to be compensated for their labor and their property? It costs $350 an acre to put a vineyard into cultivation and production. These gentlemen have expended $40 an acre for cultivation this year; there are the luscious grapes waiting for the harvest; and the Senator would give them until June 30 to harvest and to dispose of them.

They either have to go to the wine association on their knees and ask for the privilege of having these grapes made into wine or they have to let them rot upon the vines. If the wine association refuses, as it has a right to refuse—and it would be in its financial interest to so refuse in order to prevent the increase of stocks of wine on hand—if it refuses to make wine out of this $15,000,000 crop of the growers of the grapes, then the grapes will be lost and the producer will suffer. The Wine Association in good faith might say, "Gentlemen, we should like to make wine out of your grapes, but we can not do so, because there is no opportunity within the short period to sell all the wine which we have on hand, let alone what you are about to introduce into the market; therefore we refuse."

Gentlemen from California have asked me if there is any way to amend the law so as to compel the wine association to manufacture wine out of these grapes, or rent their plant. Although we are living in the day of arbitrary government, although we are granting extraordinary powers, I do not know of any way by legislation of compelling these men to manufacture wine for the grape growers against their own financial interests. If there is a way I should like to find it. The theory of arbitrary government and the granting of extensive powers is not to help the individual, no matter what he manufactures or grows, but it is to help the State. It might be urged that wine will help to win the war. Then we should come well within the war powers which are being so generously exercised; or it might be urged that money is necessary to win the war and that grapes to the value—tax value—of $15,000,000 should not be allowed "to lie in cold obstruction and to rot," but that the collector should collect the tax and cover it into the Treasury.

It would be very easy to make an argument to show that such a law would be well within the powers of Congress under the war powers granted by the Constitution, for where there have been great victories by our gallant allies in France every man who "went over the top" and carried further the cause of civilization by the destruction of the Hun had his ration of good French or California wine. It is necessary in those dismal swamps, those forbidding trenches, those conditions of warfare which rack men's nerves, to give them occasional stimulation, and it is the universal practice in France and in Italy to give wine as a daily ration to the troops. Our own boys also without hindrance drink the native wines. Therefore I submit as an argument in favor of exercising the war power to compel the wine association to manufacture grapes of the wine growers into wine that wine is a cardinal necessity for the winning of the war. We can not certainly hope to overcome the Hun on a diet of pork and Boston baked beans. "Tell me what a man eats," said Brillat Savarin, "and I will tell you what he is." The Frenchman eats well-cooked food—their chefs are famous—and drinks his well-aged wine every day in the year; so does the Italian; and they are giving a good account of themselves.

If I were making an argument for efficiency and courage and steadfastness, I might well cite the influence of beer upon the German people. It may be the conflict going on there to-day is between beer and wine, and that the chances are in favor of wine. But it has never been urged that spirituous liquors are helpful in any fight except in a bar room. However, wine and beer bring cheerfulness and contentment, and men will fight for their country when they are cheerful and content, as they will work for their country better and produce more when they are cheerful and content. They will love their country if their country loves them. Beware of rousing their resentment. That is the testimony of the United States Shipping Board, which is charged with the gravest duty which has been conferred upon any commission—the building of a new fleet, without which our troops, munitions, and food are in vain, because they have to be sent "over there." The Shipping Board has said that if you deny the worker his beer and his wine, accustomed as he is to them, for his lunch and his dinner, not involving any question of intoxication, you reduce his efficiency by 25 per cent. That is another reason why under the war power we should, at any rate, look with indulgence upon the plea which we make for beer and for wine.

We are not asking that this free people be allowed without molestation to drink wine and beer for all time. That argument was made when the question before the Senate was the adoption of the proposed constitutional amendment. It is too late to make it now.

We concede that the country is going on a "dry" basis in the spring of 1920. Why should not we allow all these interests—spirituous, malt, and vinous—that short period in which to dispose of their property? I am not speaking for all of these interests; I have a tender regard, however, for malt and vinous drinks; but why not give them all, in good American fairness, an opportunity to dispose of their stock on hand? The President says give them a year. What does that mean? It means two things: First, that, like good, honest gentlemen, we allow them to reimburse themselves for a capital and a total loss, so far as possible, out of the stocks on hand. There has been no proposition here to compensate them for their property. I spoke to a venerable and voting Prohibitionist—a Member of this body—and I said: "The Government of the United States has fostered this industry and lived off of it for years. It is estimated that it will yield a revenue this year of $800,000,000 with which to win the war. The Government, I repeat, has fostered it and lived off of it; it is a party, as much as one can be, to the production of wine and beer and spirituous liquors. Would you confiscate the property under those conditions or would you compensate?" "Why," he said, "of course I would compensate." But he voted the other way. Men do not always vote as they think or as they drink. As a cynical philosopher said, this is a free country, and a man should not be tyrannized over even by his own principles. It is true that the Government has recognized this as property in all these years, and it would be manifestly unjust to deny it the poor privilege to liquidate. Abraham Lincoln was in favor of buying and freeing the slaves out of the Federal Treasury; and how much better it would have been to have purchased the slaves and released them rather than to have killed hundreds of thousands of men in doing so and making scars which are hard to obliterate.

Now, we are making an exhibition here of a Hunish spirit in forcibly taking away from these people, without compensation, what can only be regarded in law and in morals as property and denying them a few short months in which to reimburse themselves. I can only conceive of the most narrow intellect, tainted, I believe, with no strict code of morals, that would deny a man the privilege of reimbursing himself out of his own property when the property itself is inevitably doomed in a very short time to destruction. The prohibition propaganda should be well satisfied with compassing its death without adding robbery and torture.

So far as that is concerned, the Constitution says that you shall not take away from persons property without due process of law and without just compensation. We are here sworn to uphold the Constitution; and it is a very forced construction to say that in doing this dishonest act we are promoting the interests of the war—the only justification offered for it. When I show you that neither beer nor wine brings anything but victory to our troops; that beer and wine bring nothing but efficiency to our shipyards, what do you say? It is, indeed, a very forced construction to say that we are not violating our oath in good imperial Prussian style by the subterfuge which has been urged, namely, that a few brief months of the use of these beverages will be so disastrous to our troops that they can not fight the battles of their country and so paralyzing to our workmen that they can not construct ships and munitions. Why, we are doing it; we are building ships; and in those yards where beer and wine are accessible to the men without inhibition up to this time there has been the maximum of speed in producing them.

What is the situation, Senators? The President of the United States has been empowered by Congress to regulate this traffic. He can determine the alcoholic content of wine and beer, and he can regulate the volume of production; he can regulate the amount of fuel that is allowed to breweries, and yet the gentlemen who are so eager to bring about—who are pressing their advantage and "going while the going is good"—a radical, sudden, and unexpected change are not willing to acquiesce in the law of the land as it is to-day, but desire to force the discretion of the President by another act of Congress. That President who is toiling for the express purpose which we have of winning the war, and with no other purpose in his mind, subordinating everything else to the one end, says that it is untimely to introduce these questions which divide our people, upon which there is no unanimity, certainly, and which can only irritate the men who labor in the shops and in the yards.

He says that with a beneficent smile, for there is no hate and no bitterness in the President; those attributes belong to the crusaders against wine and beer and liquor. As I observed the other day in the hearings of the committee, the only men who showed any hate were the men who were the advocates of prohibition; they seem to have a capacity of self-intoxication; and they are so endowed that they can get along without the stimulus of drink—a most delightful condition. I repeat there is no bitterness or hate in the President. He simply says: "This legislation is not timely. I have exercised my discretion in reducing the volume of beer by 40 per cent, by reducing the fuel allowed to these industries, by reducing the percentage of alcohol in malt liquors 2¾ per cent. I have done all of these things and yet they are not satisfied." And when they went to him he said: "Well, give a year at least." But the Senator from Texas comes in with a substitute, giving only to June 30 of next year for the sale and disposition of the stocks now on hand.

The date the President had in mind—and it is an open secret—was January 1, 1920. The California wine growers asked till July 1, 1920. So even what the President proposed is hardly adequate for the purpose of saving this year's grape crop. There is no intention on the part of the wine growers of California or of New York of harvesting any other crop but the crop of 1918, and the time in the substitute is fixed so they can not get another crop—it is expressly forbidden—but of selling the crop which is now upon the vines and the stock which is now on hand.

I speak, it is true, for California, because her production is very large. One hundred and seventy-six thousand acres are in wine grapes in California; I am informed there are 60,000 acres in New York State, which is the second in interest; and there are devoted to the cultivation of wine grapes perhaps 30,000 acres in Missouri and Ohio and other grape areas scattered in several other States. But the East and the West, so far as the wine makers and the wine growers are concerned, are of one mind that this legislation will be absolutely disastrous and confiscatory unless an opportunity is given them to sell their product up to July 1, 1920; and before this matter is disposed of I shall move an amendment to that effect.

Mr. President, there is no use of traversing the whole subject of alcohol; but the very latest expression, which favors neither side of the controversy, as I see it, I found in a report, official I believe, of the British Government. The commission consisted of Lord D'Abernon, Sir George Newman, Prof. Cushny, Dr. H. H. Dale, Capt. M. Greenwood, Dr. W. McDougall, Dr. F. W. Mott, Prof. Sherrington, and Dr. W. C. Sullivan.

Their report is entitled "Alcohol: Its Action on the Human Organism," published in London in 1918. In reviewing it, Mr. W. M. Bayliss, in The Living Age, says:

> The form of this little volume is a welcome innovation in Government reports, attracting instead of repelling the reader. Its object is to present the conclusions arrived at by a committee of the liquor control board after a cold and dispassionate examination of the effects of alcohol. No statements are made without exact scientific evidence, which is clearly explained. On account of the moderation of the general tone of the book, it will probably fail to please extremists of both camps, neither of whom will be able to derive much comfort from its pages. Although the authors have been unable to find evidence of an injurious action of moderate doses, well diluted, and at such intervals as to insure the elimination of a previous dose, on the other hand they show that its action is bad when taken otherwise than as mentioned, and that it is devoid of beneficial effect in any form whatever, except in certain abnormal states, to be referred to below. This point in its favor is somewhat depreciated, however, when it is pointed out that even moderate doses involve some impairment of the higher nervous functions. In one or two places the impression is given that an attempt is being made to make out the best case for it, and, on the whole, the reviewer finds himself somewhat surprised that so little is actually made out on its behalf. * * *
> The first chapter is devoted mainly to the explanation of certain terms used and to physiological preliminaries, which are, indeed, remarkably well done. It is pointed out that there is no mutual exclusion between the properties of a food and of a poison or drug; a substance, such as alcohol, may be both. The nature of alcohol as a food is discussed in the second chapter. It is oxidized almost completely and can afford energy for muscular work as well as heat. But it can not be stored, as fat and carbohydrate are stored.

I shall not read it all. It winds up:

> On the whole, it seems to the reviewer that if a man knowing nothing about the question were to pick up this volume he would scarcely be tempted to commence the consumption of alcohol. A careful study of this excellent survey of the facts is to be recommended to everyone who takes an interest in the welfare of his fellow men, and it is to be hoped that its price will not tend to restrict the wide diffusion that the book ought to have.

What struck me in reading this review is that a scientific report by scientific men under Government authority up to date has been made, and they conclude that alcohol is a food, that it creates heat, that it can not be stored as fat and carbohydrates are stored, and that it is questionable whether it does any injury or not, except to the higher nervous functions. There is no attempt to encourage people to drink alcohol, although under certain circumstances of one's condition it is good medicine. But if we were to listen to the gentlemen on the other side, we would think that there would be no palliation whatever for its use, that it was in itself injurious and damaging in the last degree to the human system; and when I read this same article I really had a better opinion of alcohol than that which I had previously enjoyed. It is not particularly helpful to the human system. On the other hand, if taken in moderate doses, it is not hurtful, and in certain cases beneficial.

The people who use beer and wine are the people who take in moderate doses beer and wine at their meals. You see the workingman drinking his beer with his bread and meat at the midday. It cheers, but not inebriates; and you find in all the Latin countries, and among the Latin peoples in America, in New York, New Jersey, and California as well, that they take their claret with their meals, and in their thrift they very often buy the grapes from the grower and make several hundred gallons of wine for yearly domestic consumption; and all members of the family, small and large, drink their claret with their meals. The revenue laws are so indulgent as to exempt from taxation, which is heavily borne by the producers of wine, 200 gallons of wine so made annually by these honest consumers.

It is well known that there is no question of food conservation embraced in the manufacture of wine. Hence I would complain in a constitutional argument, were we not deaf here to constitutional arguments, that no question of food conservation being involved, it is therefore against the Constitution to regulate a man's drink, and that those police powers are without doubt reserved for the States themselves. It has never been attempted before to go into the States and violate the rights which they enjoy under the Constitution.

There is no power in Congress to tell a man what he shall drink and what he shall not drink; how he shall live; what he shall eat. These are intimate affairs which concern the government that is closest to him, the State government. State governments sometimes pass sumptuary legislation, but never the Federal Government. Our sphere is limited by the powers delegated by the States, and they have never surrendered their powers in this respect. Therefore, when I tell you that not even the food conservationists or the prohibitionists claim that there is any loss of foodstuffs by the making of wine—that is to say, that grapes are not foodstuffs, as barley and wheat—it is a nice question whether we are not transcending constitutional limits and violating our oaths of office by dragging the little innocent wine of the people into the category of whisky and of beer.

I might grant you, as a food-conservation matter exclusively, that beer and distilled spirits are well within the purview of criticism, but not wine; and must wine suffer for her bad associations? Wine never was a popular beverage over the bars of the country. We are all in favor of closing the saloons. They will be closed; and it is the offense of the saloon as a breeding place of sin, vice, and crime that has brought down upon alcohol the condemnation of the people. But wine, I say, is a table beverage. I doubt if I ever saw a man order a glass of dry wine over a bar; so it should not be associated with the evils of the saloon. But—

The storm that rends the oak uproots the flower.

I look upon wine as something apart and by itself, and I think it should be so treated; and it would be the generous thing for those in charge of this bill, instead of haggling about dates, to exclude wine entirely from its operation, and let it fall under the general operation of the constitutional amendment, which will be in full force and effect in the spring of 1920. It would be a delicate compliment to wine, which has never fostered the saloon, which has never promoted sin or crime, which is the fond beverage of the people of Latin extraction, so largely represented in this country—they and their descendants and many besides. Shall we repel them? Shall we divert the Latin peoples to other and freer lands when we look for the rehabilitation and replenishment of our population after the war? Think of that. What would be the effect of exempting wine? The immediate effect would be to prevent a diminution of the food supplies which inevitably will follow the prohibition of wine-drinking among the great mass of the Italian, Portuguese, Spanish, and Slavic workers of this country, who are forging the thunderbolts to hurl against the insolent foe.

The effect would be to drive them to a tea and coffee diet, and there would immediately be a loss of food. If there were any way, in case wines were not produced in the United States, of substituting light wine for tea and coffee, it doubtless would be recommended by the Food Administration, in order to save tea and coffee and milk and milk products and sugar, all of which go into the tea and coffee, thus diminishing the food supply necessary to feed our own population, and the military and civil population of the countries of our allies and our own boys over there. So it is a grave mistake from the point of view of the Food Administration—I will not say that they are guilty of it—it is a great mistake from the point of view of those concerned in the prosecution of this war to deny the use of wines and beer, because necessarily the people deprived of them will take tea, coffee, milk, and sugar in their place.

I do not know that there is anything more to say. By the prohibition of wine, we do not conserve food. By the prohibition of wine you deprive the Government of revenue necessary for the successful prosecution of the war. By this proposed restriction you do a great injustice to men who have been prosecuting an industry supported by the State and Federal Government. There are 13 agricultural stations in my State teaching the people how to cultivate the grape, and what varieties to introduce. By these restrictions you confiscate this property that has been nourished by the Government, and are heedless of the appeals of your fellow citizens for relief. The whole thing is repugnant to men of sense and sentiment, led by the President of the United States, himself a prohibitionist, when it is sought to anticipate the date of effective operation of the constitutional amendment in the spring of 1920 by limiting the sale of these commodities now. It will accomplish no good. It will do a great injustice. It will reduce the revenue, if spirits are included, by nearly a billion of dollars, which will have to be raised from the thrifty and the sober, if you please. That is the punishment that will be inflicted upon them for the persistency of fanatics in anticipating the constitutional amendment. But no one in that spirit would impose taxation. Taxation is necessary for the prosecution of the war. Here is a billion dollars to be obtained by merely exercising the machinery of the Internal-Revenue Department, already organized, and it does not involve any new question. Hence the sin and the folly of raising this question at this time.

There is no consensus of opinion as to June 30, 1919, when it shall be forbidden to dispose of wine, beer, or spirits. The wine growers of California and of New York protest that they can not harvest and dispose of this year's crop, which is clearly their property, planted under the protection of the laws, within that time. Therefore, Mr. President, I shall move that June 30, 1920, be substituted for June 30, 1919, the date contained in the substitute offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], so that it will read:

That after June 30, 1920, until the conclusion of the present war, and thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President of the United States, no beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquor shall be sold for beverage purposes except for export.

That gives the wine grower and the beer maker until June 30, 1920, to sell their products. In case that amendment does not prevail, I shall offer another amendment embracing wine alone. It will be observed that this does not affect spirituous or distilled liquors, because there is already a prohibition upon their manufacturer. Beer, in the hands of the President, has been reduced in alcoholic content and volume of production. Wine has been unaffected, because there has been no need, apparently, so far as the President is concerned, of interfering with its production and sale.

By the substitute proposed by the Senator from Texas all this will be changed. There will be no longer an opportunity to derive governmental revenue from spirits in storage, which does not concern me, but does concern the public revenues. There will be no opportunity for the wine grower to harvest his crop if this substitute prevails. The only thing we ask is the privilege of harvesting this year's crop and disposing of it. As to the brewers, they can dispose, under the substitute, of their beer after June 30, 1919. The amendment which I have just proposed would give the brewers and the wine growers an opportunity to dispose of their stock up to June 30, 1920, and by that time, according to the prediction, aye, before that time, probably, the constitutional amendment will have been adopted. But this is an assurance by those who believe that that date might for one reason or other be postponed for a month or two months or six months. They will be sure under the proposal which we make of having prohibition in 1920. I think I have shown that neither wine nor beer affects, except advantageously, the conduct of the war. No appeal, therefore, can be made to the patriotism of this body to prohibit the sale of wine or of beer. We have been guided in all these matters by our great President, both sides of the Chamber acquiescing in his judgment in many matters affecting the conduct of the war, on account of his great and intimate knowledge of the Nation's needs. He is seeking to prevent industrial unrest, which might overthrow the whole structure which we have erected. He is using his diplomacy, his sense of justice, in behalf of the American workingman in guiding us faithfully through a tortuous channel of selfishness and greed. What does the President say? He says give these people another year. That is what my amendment calls for.

Therefore, I am opposed to the adoption of the substitute submitted by the Senator from Texas without amendment, and I pray that my amendment, giving an extension of time for one year longer than proposed by the substitute, will be voted by this body.

I submit the following communications as a part of my remarks:

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., July 1, 1918.

Hon. JAMES D. PHELAN.
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Voicing sentiments and interests of 200,000 Italians in California, while thanking you for your strenuous fight to save wine industry, beg you to renew your efforts not only on behalf of Italian interest but, above all, for interest of whole Nation. The numerous Italians employed in war-material factories and in all branches of activities, and especially agriculture, which is now the most important factor to hasten victory, would be greatly discouraged even though Jones amendment would go into effect next year. Apart from the great losses caused by the destruction of wine industry, the wines the aliens drink at meals, to which they have been accustomed since childhood, gives them strength and energy and acts as a preventive against alcoholism. Statistics both in America and Europe give Italians rank of honor in sobriety, which fact scientists attribute to their moderate use of wines. Prohibitionists should during these grave times avoid cause for dissension and give example of abnegation as all other elements and parties are doing. Kindest regards.

ETTORE PATRIZE,
Editor of l'Italia.

Senator JAMES PHELAN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: * * * I am convinced that wine has been, is, and always will be a very healthy beverage, and that the use of wine is the best means of preventing use and abuse of intoxicating, poisonous drink. Hoping that the country will be saved such a big loss, I am,

Sincerely, yours,

PAOLO DE VECCHI, M. D.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., July 9, 1918.

Senator JAMES D. PHELAN,
Senate, Washington, D. C.:

You might remind the Senate that California, by population furnished most troops, most money, most food for war. Would Congress reward California by destroying three greatest industries—barley, wine, hops? Barley depends here on brewing, and grapes on wine industry. California elected Wilson President.

R. M. WOOD.

SANTA ROSA, CAL., August 1, 1918.

Hon. JAMES D. PHELAN,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

SIR: At the regular meeting of the directors of the Sonoma County Farm Bureau, held on July 20, 1918, a committee was appointed to make representations to the President and others concerned regarding the passage of the Norris prohibition amendment. As members of that committee, which speaks for an organization representing 1,400 loyal farmers of Sonoma County, we desire to call your attention to some of the certain effects of the adoption of the prohibition amendment to the Agricultural appropriation bill.

First, vineyards: The wine-grape industry in Sonoma County has been fostered by the State and Nation until there are now 20,000 acres of wine grapes within the county, 75 per cent of which is on land not adapted for the production of any other crop. The curtailment of the manufacture of this year's grape crop will mean economic ruin to hundreds of families in Sonoma County whose sons are now offering themselves for the supreme sacrifice. All principles of justice and equity demand that the owners of these vineyards be compensated if they are summarily to be forced out of business.

Second, hops: The unfairness of prohibitory legislation at a time of year when all the work has been done on the present crop is apparent to all who have even a rudimentary knowledge of the business of hop producing. Immediate and sumptuary prohibition will mean the total loss of capital and labor involved in the production of the present crop and will not result in the increase of a single pound of food during the present season. A reasonable extension of time of the enacting clause in the prohibition amendment will enable the hop producers to prepare and execute their plans for the production next session of essential crops on land that is now producing hops.

Third, business conditions: Immediate prohibition will mean the loss of $4,000,000 this year to the producers of Sonoma County. Obviously this loss will seriously impair the ability of the banks of the county to meet their quota of liberty bonds, war-savings stamps, certificates of indebtedness, etc., and will probably make it impossible for the county to raise its share of the Red Cross and other funds necessary for the conduct of the war.

Trusting that our appeal for justice in the matter will meet with your earnest consideration and hearty approval, we are

Yours, very truly,

SONOMA COUNTY FARM BUREAU,
By SHERIDAN W. BAKER,
GEORGE E. MERRILL,
T. P. DOYLE,
C. E. HUMBERT,
Committee.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I desire to address an inquiry to the Senator from Texas having this matter in charge. He has presented his substitute which is before the Senate but of which unfortunately there are no printed copies. I think it would be well, in order to perfect the RECORD, if he would state, and I certainly would like personally the information, just how the substitute alters the amendment as printed in the bill before the Senate. In what particular does it change the committee bill?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, by the amendment proposed by the committee and which was pending at the time the Senate informally recessed the sale of all intoxicating liquors is to be stopped January 1, 1919, and the manufacture of beer and wine is to stop on November 1, 1918. The amendment I now propose stops the sale of all intoxicating liquors on June 30, 1919, and the manufacture of beer and wine on May 1, 1919. It provides—

That nothing in this act shall be construed to interfere with the power conferred upon the President by section 15 of the food-control act, approved August 10, 1917.

A provision is also added giving the President authority to establish dry zones around shipbuilding plants and other plants for the manufacture of war material if he should deem that the emergency was sufficient to justify such action.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator, I understand, is explaining how the amendment alters the present law.

Mr. SHEPPARD. No; I am explaining how it alters the amendment that was pending before the Senate when the Senate took a recess.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not see, from comparing them, that it alters it materially at all. The bill that I have here before me prohibits the manufacture of these products after June 30.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That was the amendment which was first reported by the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. PENROSE. Then I have the wrong amendment.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Exactly.

Mr. PENROSE. I wish I could get a copy of the right one. In a matter of this importance it is very unfortunate, I think, that members of the Senate are unable to get copies of the Norris amendment, I believe it is called, or of the Sheppard amendment.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The confusion is due to the fact that the Senate took a recess before it voted finally on the amendment proposed by the committee shortly before the recess, which was to take the place of the amendment they had already reported as a part of the bill.

Mr. PENROSE. Then, as I understand it, the Senate has never acted on the amendment which was considered by the committee before the recess.

Mr. SHEPPARD. It had not taken final action. The only action that it took was to pass on the point of order which the Senator made against it.

Mr. PENROSE. I am glad the Senator has refreshed my memory, because the impression has undoubtedly gone abroad that in some way that amendment had been adopted by the committee and even by the Senate. Then the Senator offers this as a substitute for the so-called Norris amendment?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I offer it as an amendment to the amendment which was reported by the committee, and which was pending when the Senate recessed.

Mr. PENROSE. Then I should like to ask the Senator a question for the RECORD and for the information of myself and many thousands of citizens interested in this question. I may say I have no desire whatever to delay this matter. In what particular does the amendment now pending to-day differ from the amendment which was pending prior to the recess?

Mr. SHEPPARD. The amendment last offered before the recess stops the sale of all intoxicating liquors January 1, 1919. This amendment which I propose to-day extends that time to June 30, 1919. This last committee amendment stops the manufacture of wine and beer November 1, 1918, while the amendment I propose stops it May 1, 1919. Those are the material alterations.

Mr. PENROSE. The effect is to stop the manufacture and sale of everything after June 30?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Exactly; that is true; the manufacture of wine and beer on May 1 and the sale of all intoxicating liquors on June 30.

Mr. PENROSE. One more question and I will be through, Mr. President. As to the provision regarding the Commissioner of Internal Revenue the amendment says:

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue is hereby authorized and directed to prescribe rules and regulations, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, in regard to the removal of distilled spirits held in bond after June 30, 1919, until this act will cease to operate, for other than beverage purposes; also in regard to the sale and distribution of wine for sacramental, medicinal, or other than beverage uses.

I should like to ask the Senator whether that phraseology is adequate? It permits the sale and distribution for sacramental uses, but when the present supply of wine is exhausted by reason of the stoppage of its manufacture where will the wine be forthcoming for these religious purposes?

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator will note the clause relating to wine in the bill which prohibits the manufacture and sale of wine for beverage purposes.

Mr. PENROSE. I understand that.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That means that it may be manufactured for nonbeverage purposes. Sacramental use is a nonbeverage purpose.

Mr. PENROSE. Does the Senator construe it under the phraseology that wine can really be manufactured for sacramental and medicinal purposes?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I do.

Mr. PENROSE. That is distinctly understood by the committee and by you?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I think so.

Mr. PENROSE. That is to say, if a physician recommended a quart of champagne to a patient, he could draw a prescription to that effect?

Mr. SHEPPARD. If it was for medicinal purposes, he could.

Mr. PENROSE. There is a ray of hope. I was more particularly interested in knowing whether the language here fully covers all religious purposes, concerning which I have had some communications. If the Senator construes the act that way, which it seems to me would be rather vague, I am satisfied.

I should like to ask the Senator one more question. This legislation permits the exports of all spirits, wine, and beer, as I understand it. Is that correct?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It does.

Mr. PENROSE. Has the Senator in mind any purpose for which we should be called upon to export these products? If they are bad at home, why should we export them or permit them to be used abroad? I am just a little curious to know.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I think that is a question to be decided by the people of other countries.

Mr. THOMAS. I suggest to the Senator that perhaps the purpose is to get the people of other countries drunk and then trade with them. [Laughter.]

Mr. PENROSE. That might be, and it might be an economic question after the war, but with 4,000,000 soldiers by next summer in France it does not seem to me that the purpose of this legislation will be fully carried out. With 4,000,000 Americans over there, full permission to export these materials to France would seem to me largely to nullify the object the Senator from Texas has in view. I am still a little curious to know why that exception was made. I do not object to it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. If we could control the disposition of alcoholic liquors in other countries, there might be something in the question of the Senator.

Mr. PENROSE. As a food-conservation proposition why should we permit grain and fruit and cereals to be used in the manufacture of wine and beer and whisky to be exported?

Mr. SHEPPARD. We can not accomplish everything at once.

Mr. PENROSE. Would the Senator be willing to accept an amendment to forbid the export? I do not intend to offer it, however.

Mr. SHEPPARD. If the Senator will offer an amendment to that effect——

Mr. PENROSE. No; this is really a search for information.

Mr. JONES of Washington obtained the floor.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator from Washington will yield, I should like to ask the Senator from Texas whether the last clause of his amendment does not nullify the amendment. It provides that nothing in the amendment shall affect the powers given to the President under section 15 of what is known as the food-conservation act. My reading of that section gives rise to the impression that if the power now possessed by the President under existing law is not to be affected then we are wasting time in legislating upon the subject.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I do not think it would nullify the amendment. The existing powers of the President have no application to sales.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Texas a question. Unfortunately, as the Senator from Pennsylvania has observed, the substitute offered by the Senator from Texas has not been printed, so that we could have an opportunity to read it and know its contents except as read from the Secretary's desk. I understood the Senator from Texas to say in reply to a question asked by the Senator from Pennsylvania that the substitute permitted the indefinite manufacture of spirituous liquors for the purposes of export. Is the Senator correct about that? My impression was that it only permitted the withdrawal of liquors already manufactured for purposes of export abroad, but it did not permit the further manufacture of liquors for the purpose of export.

Mr. SHEPPARD. My proposed amendment applies to the sale of liquors and not to the manufacture.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then I understand the Senator to say that while any liquor already manufactured and in bond may be withdrawn and exported after June 1, 1919, it does not permit liquors to be manufactured after that time for the purpose of export?

Mr. SHEPPARD. My amendment deals only with sales of distilled liquors. Under the food-control act they may still be made for nonbeverage uses.

Mr. SIMMONS. That was my understanding.

Mr. PENROSE. But, if the Chair will permit me, it does permit it. I understood the Senator from Texas to declare that wines and spirits and beer may be manufactured for medicinal and sacramental purposes. Is that correct?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. PENROSE. They can continue to manufacture beer or wine or whisky for medicinal purposes and wine for sacramental purposes. Is that the understanding of the Senator from North Carolina? It is very important that we understand that.

Mr. SIMMONS. From the reading of the amendment it was my understanding that they could continue to manufacture wine for sacramental purposes, but it was not my understanding that they could continue to manufacture liquors for medicinal purposes.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator from Texas has distinctly stated that to be the case.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to have the Senator from Texas examine the amendment and state whether that is true or not.

Mr. SHEPPARD. It is my understanding that it permits the manufacture of liquors for nonbeverage uses.

Mr. SIMMONS. To be used for medicinal purposes. It must be consumed by the patient.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. My impression had been that while it permitted the manufacture for purposes of the sciences and art and the manufacture for munitions and things of that sort it was not to be permitted to be manufactured for medicinal purposes.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Will the Senator allow me to read the clause in the amendment?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; I should like to hear it.

Mr. SHEPPARD (reading)—

> After May 1, 1919, until the conclusion of the present war and thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined by the President of the United States, no grains, cereals, fruit, or other food products shall be used in the manufacture or production of beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquor for beverage purposes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then the Senator's construction is that it would not interfere with the manufacture of liquor for medicinal purposes?

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is the construction, and I have so answered the Senator from Pennsylvania. The existing food-control act permits the making of distilled liquors for nonbeverage purposes, while my amendment permits the making of other liquors for such purposes.

Mr. PENROSE. I will state that notwithstanding the construction of the Senator from Texas I still think the bill is rather vaguely drawn on that point.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, there seems to be such a variety of views regarding the meaning of the amendment, as the Senate has not had an opportunity to study it and analyze it, I suggest that the amendment be printed, and that the matter go over until to-morrow morning.

Mr. PENROSE. We can not do it. We are operating under a unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The matter is plain. There is no just basis for any variety of view.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington has been recognized and he will proceed.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I agree with the statement just made by the Senator from Texas that there is no variety of opinion about what this amendment means. This is a matter that has been discussed and has been printed for weeks. The substitute proposed by the Senator from Texas does not change the language of the amendment the committee reported several weeks ago except in so far as the date itself is concerned. The language with reference to exports and the language with reference to manufacture is exactly the same, and there can not be any question, at least there is not in my mind, but that there is no interference whatever with reference to the manufacture of wine for sacramental purposes or medicinal purposes. If my friend from Pennsylvania is exercised over the export matter, and if he desires further restrictions and limitations, they will be welcomed by the friends of temperance.

Mr. PENROSE. I am afraid they would be welcomed with such mental reservations that it would be an act of cruelty to propose the amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. They would be welcomed just as the Reed bone-dry amendment was welcomed.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I want to assure my friend the Senator from Washington that the suggestion I made was not with a view of delaying action upon this amendment. I have not had an opportunity myself to study the amendment, but if it is satisfactory to the powers that be it is going to be adopted. I would like to have prohibition go into effect at once. That is what I am more interested in than anything else. That is not going to be done, and so far as I am concerned, if it is satisfactory to the Senate I am willing to vote on it right now.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think there is no difference between the Senator from Mississippi and myself in reference to those matters. I merely wanted to call attention to the fact that the amendment printed July 8 contains exactly the language of the substitute of the Senator from Texas except a change in date and then the two new propositions.

Mr. President, I had prepared a speech, at least to my satisfaction, to be made on the propositions advanced by the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and others. I am not going to make that speech; I am going to lay it aside, but I am going to take the time of the Senate for just three or four minutes to make a brief statement as to my position in reference to this substitute.

Mr. President, there are millions of men and women who will be grievously disappointed at the action we propose to take. They are of the best and most patriotic citizens of this Republic and there will be no sulking and no rebelling upon their part. These men and women feel that prohibition now would be one of the most effective means of doing what everybody says we seek to do—win the war. I believe they are right. To this end I introduced this amendment:

From and after 30 days from the date of the approval of this act no foods, fruits, food materials, or feeds shall, during the continuance of the present war, be used in the production of malt or vinous liquors for beverage purposes, and anyone who willfully violates this provision or any rule or regulation made to carry the same into effect shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both.

The President and the Food Administration said this would lead to an "orgy of drunkenness" unless Congress should stop the sale of distilled liquors. To meet this objection I introduced the following amendment:

Provided, That from and after the date of the approval of this act and during the continuance of the present war it shall be unlawful to sell, furnish, or transport distilled spirits for beverage purposes, and no distilled spirits held in bond at the date of the approval of this act shall be removed therefrom for beverage purposes, and from and after 30 days from the date of the approval of this act no food, fruits, food materials, or feeds shall, during the continuance of the present war, be used in the production of malt or vinous liquors for beverage purposes, and the President is hereby authorized and directed to prescribe any and all rules and regulations deemed necessary to carry the foregoing provisions into effect, and anyone who willfully violates any of the foregoing provisions or any rule or regulation made to carry the same into effect shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue and all other officers of the United States shall have all the power for the enforcement of the foregoing provisions which is conferred by law for the enforcement of the existing laws relating to the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors under the revenue laws of the United States or otherwise.

After extensive hearings, the committee finally reported the provision now pending and for which a substitute is offered and which is substantially my amendment with the time extended. This amendment reads as follows:

That after December 31, 1918, until the conclusion of the present war, for the purpose of conserving the man power of the Nation and to increase efficiency in the production of arms, war munitions, ships, food, and clothing for the Army and Navy, it shall be unlawful to sell for beverage purposes any distilled spirits, and during said time no distilled spirits held in bond shall be removed therefrom for beverage purposes except for export. After November 1, 1918, until the conclusion of the present war, no grain, cereal, fruit, or other food product shall be used in the manufacture or production of beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquor for beverage purposes. After December 31, 1918, until the conclusion of the present war, no beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquor shall be sold for beverage purposes except for export. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue is hereby authorized and directed to prescribe rules and regulations subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, in regard to the removal of distilled spirits held in bond after December 31, 1918, for other than beverage purposes, also in regard to the sale and distribution of wine for sacramental, medicinal, or other nonbeverage uses. After the approval of this act no distilled, malt, vinous, or other intoxicating liquors shall be imported into the United States.

Any person who violates any of the foregoing provisions shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.

The Senate was ready to adopt this amendment by a large majority. The President urges now that more time be given to permit the distillers to dispose of their stocks on hand. Instead of an "orgy of drunkenness," our Commander in Chief has other fears which are not officially disclosed. I believe he is wrong, but I may be mistaken. His opinion on a matter of such moment and of such direct relation to the conduct of the war should have great weight, and very properly does have great weight in the Congress of the United States. Without going further into the reasons for my conclusion, I am satisfied we could not enact this provision into law to go into effect sooner than June 30, 1919. We can do that, and therefore I favor it as the best legislative solution of the situation.

The provision giving the President authority to establish dry zones about coal mines, munition plants, shipyards, and so forth, is of supreme importance. The President may never use it; but if the need for coal, ships, munitions, and so forth, becomes imperative and the power is not used, the responsibility will be certain. I believe the need is imperative now for the exercise of this power.

Mr. President, I desire to place in the RECORD as a part of my remarks the appeal of the coal operators with reference to this matter and also the President's proclamation regarding it, if I may be permitted to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, leave is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

COAL OPERATORS APPEAL.

Regardless of political affiliations of the members of the association, and leaving out of consideration the moral issues involved, and basing its opinion entirely on economic and patriotic grounds, the committee unanimously and unqualifiedly believes that national prohibition for the period of the war is absolutely necessary to make effective this or any other plan for increased coal production. A comparison of the records of production of mines in wet and dry territories furnishes ample proof of the need of prohibition. The various instances cited to you to-day need not be repeated here, but they typify the experience of operations throughout the entire country.

Chairman A. R. Hamilton of the committee said:

"Our committee is composed of practical operating men, representing all the principal producing districts of the country. They are men of all shades of personal opinion. Some come from wet States, some from dry States, and some from States partly wet and partly dry. They all told their stories and presented their figures to show not only the relative efficiency of the mines as between wet and dry States, but the difficulties of working out any practical benefits from drink restriction along the border line between wet and dry territory. The result was a determined and unqualified stand for national prohibition.

"The committee feels that the drinking evil has become so rampant in the mining communities that its complete elimination is fundamentally necessary in the effort to speed up the mines sufficiently to get the 100,000,000 additional tons of coal this country will require this year. It is now up to Congress to make a clean-cut choice between booze for the mining communities and coal for the war and the public."

Here is an account of the action of another coal operators association:

"Coalless breweries should be made by legislation to succeed lightless nights and heatless days. This is a conviction that is heard expressed wherever a patriotic and unprejudiced study of the questions of prohibition and fuel production is made. It is evident that the two questions are inseparable. A discussion of the coal supply and distribution inevitably develops into the great waste of coal in the manufacture of beer."

That coal operators are aware of this fact is evident from a letter sent to President Wilson recently by the Pittsburgh Vein Operators' Association of Ohio. This letter was as follows:

"DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: At the monthly meeting of the Pittsburgh Vein Operators' Association of Ohio, representing an annual production of 18,000,000 tons, the principal subject of discussion was the uncalled-for loss of production resulting from failure of employees to report for work on days preceding and following holidays and immediately after semimonthly pay days. Coupled with these periods of idleness are the foreign holidays.

"Taken as a whole, the loss of production in this one industry, especially at this time, is immeasurable. In this district alone the loss of production on Friday, the 5th of July, was at least 30,000 tons.

"It was the unanimous opinion that the only way to correct the evil is to eliminate the cause; that halfway measures would accomplish nothing; that patriotic appeals on one side could not cope with the saloon on the other; that the elimination of drinking places, at least for the period of the war, would add 10 per cent or more to the production of things necessary for the carrying on of the war.

"A committee was appointed to present the following facts to you for your consideration:

"First. That idleness among employees in the industrial plants of this country on days following holidays and pay days is the direct result of intoxicants.

"Second. That the abolition of intoxicants for the period of the war will add at least 10 per cent to the production of the commodities necessary for the conduct of the war.

"Third. That there is a body of able-bodied men outside the draft age engaged in manufacturing and selling liquor whose energies should be devoted to some necessary occupation.

"Fourth. In order to bring our soldiers and sailors to the highest state of efficiency it was found necessary, and commendably so, to abolish intoxicants from the service. If this be necessary, where men are under the strictest discipline, how much more necessary is it to the vast number of employees upon whom the welfare of our soldiers and sailors depends, and over whom there is no discipline, that the same limitation should apply.

"Fifth. We are strong advocates of 'personal liberty,' but at the same time we are reaching out into the homes and taking our boys to the battle fronts in Europe. If this so-called 'personal liberty' urged by the advocates of the saloon is working to the detriment of or danger to these boys, the question of its sacrifice should be secondary, and no citizen of the United States who is a real patriot can honestly take any other position.

"We therefore urge upon you that you use your influence to have immediate steps taken to correct this evil from which we are now suffering.

"Respectfully, yours,

"PITTSBURGH VEIN OPERATORS' ASSOCIATION OF OHIO,
"By C. E. MAURER,
"F. A. PRENDERGAST,
"W. R. WOODFORD."

The President's proclamation reads as follows:

"To all those engaged in coal mining: The existing scarcity of coal is creating a grave danger—in fact, the most serious which confronts us—and calls for prompt and vigorous action on the part of both operators and miners. Without an adequate supply, our war program will be retarded; the effectiveness of our fighting forces in France will be lessened; the lives of our soldiers will be unnecessarily endangered and their hardships increased, and there will be much suffering in many homes throughout the country during the coming winter.

"I am well aware that your ranks have been seriously depleted by the draft, by voluntary enlistment, and by the demands of other essential industries. This handicap can be overcome, however, and sufficient coal can be mined in spite of it, if every one connected with the industry, from the highest official to the youngest boy, will give his best work each day for the full number of work hours. The operators must be zealous as never before to bring about the highest efficiency of management, to establish the best possible working conditions, and to accord fair treatment to everybody, so that the opportunity to work at his best may be accorded every workman.

"The miners should report for work every day, unless prevented by unavoidable causes, and should not only stay in the mines the full time but also see to it that they get out more coal than ever before. The other workers in and about the mines should work as regularly and faithfully, so that the work of the miner may not be retarded in any way. This will be especially necessary from this time forward, for your numbers may be further lessened by the draft, which will induct into the Army your fair share of those not essential to industry. Those who are drafted, but who are essential will be given deferred classification, and it is their patriotic duty to accept it. And it is the patriotic duty of their friends and neighbors to hold them in high regard for doing so. The only worker who deserves the condemnation of his community is the one who fails to give his best in this crisis; not the one who accepts deferred classification and works regularly and diligently to increase the coal output.

"A great task is to be performed. The operators and their staffs alone can not do it, nor can the mine workers alone do it; but both parties, working hand in hand with a grim determination to rid the country of its greatest obstacle to winning the war, can do it. It is with full confidence that I call upon you to assume the burden of producing an ample supply of coal. You will, I am sure, accept this burden and will successfully carry it through, and in so doing you will be performing a service just as worthy as service in the trenches, and will win the applause and gratitude of the whole Nation.

"WOODROW WILSON.

"THE WHITE HOUSE, August 9, 1918."

The statement of the operators' association is as follows:

"Unless the production of domestic sizes of anthracite can be increased—something impossible unless the labor power can be increased, and entirely possible should it be—the distribution of anthracite will fall short of that which was contemplated in the allotment made by the Fuel Administration for the 12 months ending April 1, next.

"Such allotment was based upon an estimated production of 54,345,783 tons of domestic anthracite for the coal year. The actual output of domestic anthracite sizes for the three-month period to the end of June was 13,279,889 tons. That is at the rate of 53,120,000 tons for the year, or 1,226,000 tons less than was counted upon in the estimate.

"Unless there can be accomplished a decided pick-up in the output, and only additional labor power for the anthracite industry can make this possible, it will be necessary to proportionately cut down on the allotments of anthracite to the New England and Atlantic States, to which materially increased tonnages of coal were allowed to meet their larger requirements.

"Under such conditions it will be impossible to increase any of the curtailed shipments of anthracite to the Central and Northwest States, as had been hoped, and to which States the promise was made that their necessary reduced allotments would be increased should it be possible to extend the total production above the 54,545,783 tons of domestic coal estimated as the output for the year.

"Labor shortage has become more and more a restricting factor on production. There are only 144,000 mine workers in the anthracite industry, a number 33,000 less than before the war."

The Fuel Administration's estimate of the average daily requirements of bituminous coal for summer months to September 30 is 3,100,000 tons. The Geological Survey reported on Sunday that the average of the mines for the week ended July 20 was 2,154,000 tons; for the week ended July 27, 2,137,000 tons; and for the week ended August 3, 2,070,000 tons, or a daily shortage of 30,000 tons.

WASTE OF COAL PROTESTED—LATITUDE GIVEN TO BREWERS STIRS LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEERS.

CLEVELAND, OHIO.

W. S. Stone, grand chief of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, is watching with some interest the preliminary campaign of northern Ohio Congressmen this summer, because it was to them, as well as to the two United States Senators from Ohio, that Chief Stone addressed his recent communication in regard to national prohibition, and especially to the fact that the distillers, brewers, and saloon keepers of the United States were being permitted to consume both foodstuffs and fuel, while the Nation is resounding with exhortations from both the Fuel and Food administrations over the serious situation concerning both these materials which confronts the American people.

"Billboards, newspapers, posters on hotel and restaurant walls," Chief Stone said to a representative of the western bureau of the Christian Science Monitor a few days ago, "proclaim in colored type the necessity for the conservation of food and fuel; yet millions of bushels of grain are being wasted through the liquor traffic. Last year the slogan, 'Save a shovelful of coal' was perpetually presented to our eyes, while the breweries, saloons, and distilleries of the United States were permitted to burn up 3,000,000 tons of coal. While this waste was being permitted, the Federal Fuel Administrator was enforcing 'heatless days' and 'workless days' on the workers of America.

"Such a situation is so ridiculous and incongruous that it is difficult to see how a sane people can permit its existence. What would be thought of a railroad engineer who ran past such signals as these? We all know what would happen; he would probably wreck his train and lose his job. Yet here are storm signals and danger signals flaunting in the face of every intelligent newspaper reader in the country; and still the saloon keeper goes merrily on his way. Workingmen may freeze or go hungry, or the country itself may go to pieces, yet he, apparently, goes free. It has got to a point in this country where the liquor interests are greater than the flag. They certainly seem to have very little interest in that emblem. They have become a law unto themselves, and go their own way, while other people suffer.

"I would like to ask some of our labor friends what they think would become of a labor leader who undertook to defy public sentiment in the manner that the distillers, brewers, and saloon keepers of America are apparently defying it. If they undertook anything of a similar character, they would promptly be landed in jail.

"I recently had occasion to send a protest on behalf of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers of the United States to the representatives of the State of Ohio in the United States Senate and the representatives of two of the Cleveland districts in Congress. I am not sure that it did very much good. Some of these Congressmen are now seeking a renomination. I think I can see the result. I believe that the defeat of one of them is assured, because, after all, the people at large do see these things, even if their representatives for the time being do not. The Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers is a strictly temperance organization. It has no place in its ranks for the patron of the saloon, the distillery, or the brewer."

Mr. JONES of Washington. I also desire to read a brief extract from the Washington Post of Sunday, August 25, 1918, bearing on that matter:

HAIG AND FOCH ASK COAL—BRITISH MINERS URGED TO INCREASE OUTPUT FOR UNITED STATES ARMY'S NEEDS.

LONDON, August 24.

Marshal Foch, Field Marshal Haig, and Admiral Beatty, commander in chief of the grand fleet, sent messages to the meeting of the coal miners' federation at Southampton this week urging a greater output of coal.

"Coal is the key to victory. The miners of Great Britain must help me," was the message from Marshal Foch.

Baron Calthrop, the coal controller, told the miners that the supply was 36,000,000 tons short this year. Among other factors making for an increased demand for coal was the increasing flow of American troops to France.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator speaks of the plea of the coal operators in a general way. What was that plea?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The plea of the coal operators was in brief that this country faced a proposition where it would have to choose between "booze" and coal, and if we chose "booze" we would be short of coal this winter by many millions of tons.

Mr. KENYON. The time fixed in the bill does not affect that situation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The time will not, but the authority given to the President to establish free zones about coal mines can be used to help very greatly.

Mr. KENYON. I agree with the Senator about that, but the time fixed in the bill would not affect it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is true. I can not defend, as far as the merits of the proposition are concerned, the extension of this time. I am not trying to do it. I do not pretend to do it. It makes me sick when I try to satisfy my own convictions in reference to the matter. It is only the legislative situation and the executive situation that lead me to accept this proposition, together with the clause in this substitute that I am just referring to.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If the Senator will permit me, can he state about how much coal is used in this manufacture?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I understand it is about 3,000,000 tons a year.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I think the Senator could not advance a reason for that consumption of one of the prime necessaries of life.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I can not, satisfactory to me.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I do not think anybody else can.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have a letter from the neighboring State of New Jersey that bears upon this order of the President as a necessity for it that speaks very loudly. It is a letter from a member of the county executive committee of the National War Savings Committee. The writer says:

Please allow me to give you several additional points regarding results of liquor at near-by munition plants. At the recent fire at the Atlantic Loading Co. plant, when a heavy financial loss occurred and 30 horses were killed, the firemen report that the first four men encountered on the reservation were grossly intoxicated. A fifth man, apparently sober, was found who offered to show the firemen a water plug. As soon as he had gone a hundred feet or so he pulled out a quart bottle of whisky and offered to treat the firemen. There are millions of pounds of deadly explosive stored at this plant.

During May 2,500 laborers were hired, but at the end of the month there was a net gain of less than 100, as over 2,400 laborers quit, many were fired for laziness, due in part to semidrunken condition, many for gross intoxication, and many quitting because they did not care to associate with such an element. And this plant needs 2,000 more laborers and is held back until it gets same.

Mr. President, I can not refrain from reading a brief statement from a copy of a letter that was sent by a lady to a Senator from one of the great States of this Union. It applies, of course, to only one particular case, but it can be multiplied thousands and thousands of times throughout the country. This lady says:

I am a resident of your own State of ———. My husband is a railroad engineer, who has lost every position he ever had because of his weakness for drink. He now has a good position with the United States Steel Corporation. The foreman of the roundhouse has told him he will surely discharge him if he does not stop drinking. He gets very large wages, and in the past has laid off a great deal recovering from the effects of drink. I am trying to hold him up until the awful curse is driven from the State. Won't you help me by voting for the prohibition amendment? Prohibition is coming anyway, but it may be too late for me. If you want to help your country, then help by your vote to free it from that which is destroying its men and bringing sorrow to the homes. You will be glad of it when history is written.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Does she want it stopped in June next year?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; she wants it stopped at once.

Mr. President, I have been for war-time prohibition purely as a war measure. Prohibition as such has not entered into it with me at all. I am heart and soul for pushing this war with all our power of men, money, and resources. We have just voted to take our 18-year-old boys to the battle line, despite the protests of the mothers of the land. It seems almost a mockery to heed the cry of the whisky dealer for more time to profit out of broken hearts, impoverished homes, and destroyed man power. With a very sad heart I shall vote for this substitute, believing it the best we can get and hoping that the vital authority placed in the hands of the President to care for the coal, shipping, and munition situation will be promptly and freely used by him.

Mr. President, I simply ask to put into the RECORD one or two matters. The Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] referred to the Shipping Board as favoring the continuance of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, and as having stated that the best work is done in a shipyard where beer and wine were used. I ask to have printed in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, without taking the time of the Senate to read it, an article from the Philadelphia North American of July 1, starting in this way:

When Edward N. Hurley, chairman of the United States Shipping Board, expressed fears to Congress last week that a nation-wide ban on booze would retard shipbuilding, hundreds of brawny patriots who are pounding out ships in Camden in record time replied:

"Tell it to Tommy Mason!"

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the article referred to will be printed in the RECORD.

The article referred to is as follows:

[From the North American, Philadelphia, July 1, 1918.]

SHIPBUILDING RECORD BREAKERS DISPROVE HURLEY'S BEER PLEA—NO BOOZE SECRET OF SUCCESS AT CAMDEN YARD, THEY SHOW—CRACK GANG'S CHIEF BARS ALL DRINKERS.

When Edward N. Hurley, chairman of the United States Shipping Board, expressed fears to Congress last week that a nation-wide ban on booze would retard shipbuilding, hundreds of brawny patriots who are pounding out ships in Camden in record time replied:

"Tell it to Tommy Mason!"

Tommy Mason was superintendent of the construction work on the Tuckahoe, the naval collier turned out of the yards of the New York Shipbuilding Co. in 27 days, breaking a world's record.

After the launching of the Tuckahoe Charles M. Schwab, director of the Shipping Board, sought Mason to learn how he and his men had made such phenomenal speed.

"I want to pass your secret along to the other shipyards," said Schwab.

"No booze," replied Mason. "That's the secret."

Schwab didn't testify before the congressional committee last week in the hearing on war prohibition, or he might have repeated the story as Tommy Mason gave it to him.

YARD'S MOST EFFICIENT GANG.

He might have told them Mason's group of workers, each of whom received a reward from Schwab, not only broke a world's record in turning out the Tuckahoe, but how it has attained a reputation in the Camden shipyards as the gang that can do the fastest work, has fewer absences from all causes, and 50 per cent fewer accidents than any other group of workmen of the same size in the plant.

He might have told how Mason, when the order of the day in the Nation's shipyards was "speed up," watched to see that no boozers got places on his gang. Mason has spent almost a lifetime in the shipyards and experience told him that booze and efficient work don't mix.

There were just two exceptions to Tommy Mason's ban on boozers. They were two riveters, whom he permitted to remain in his gang for a while, although he knew that they "took a drink or two" in the morning before they came to work.

But Mason also discovered that it was several hours each day before these two men reached their maximum speed, and occasionally they failed to report for duty.

The superintendent took a pencil and paper and did some calculating. He found out what the delay of these two men was costing the work of the gang. He deducted the number of rivets which "a drink or two" in the morning was costing.

He found that sober riveters had a larger average of rivets to their credit at the end of the week, and the two boozers left. The Tuckahoe's record satisfied him that he is on the right course.

Tommy Mason isn't the only shipbuilder who has arrived at the same conclusion. Heads of plants in Camden have asked the excise commissioners to close the city's saloons in the morning until after the workmen have reported for duty.

BOOZE CUTS EFFICIENCY 20 PER CENT.

Opinions of Hurley and Bainbridge Colby to the contrary, these practical business men say that rum lessens the efficiency of shipyard workers 20 per cent. And a 20 per cent delay in ship construction these days may mean disaster. Excise commissioners in Camden complied with the request, and saloons were closed in the mornings. But now the men go to work on various shifts at all hours of the day, and the saloons open inviting doors. Besides, superintendents can not be as particular in their choice of men to-day as was Tommy Mason when he picked the gang that broke the record on the Tuckahoe. Laborers are not so plentiful. Sometimes it is necessary to take a man who is known to be a boozer or try to run the plant short handed.

With labor conditions and the absence of restraining laws thus helping them, saloonkeepers in the neighborhood of Camden's shipyards are doing a rushing business. Workers line up outside to wait their turn at the bar. According to events in Washington last week, Tommy Mason's secret of the Tuckahoe's record has not reached Chairman Hurley and some other members of the Shipping Board. It should also be stated here that Tommy Mason is no "prohibition fanatic," as some of the booze allies call them. When a clergyman, who is pastor of a church attended by a member of the shipbuilding firm, heard of Mason's refusal to hire boozers, he went to Mason to congratulate him.

"Now don't get me wrong," replied Mason. "We may both be aganist booze, but for different reasons. My objections are based on the fact that it lessens the efficiency of the men. I'm against booze because it interferes with the building of ships, and we need ships."

Mr. JONES of Washington. I hope that the Senator from California will read that article. If so, he will find that the record was made by a crew from which the booze consumers had been removed; that the record there made was made by temperance workers, just as the great record made in the yards on the Pacific coast as shown by the publication of the Shipping Board itself demonstrates.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I did not understand the Senator from Washington. He referred to Tommy Mason. Who is he?

Mr. JONES of Washington. If the Senator from California will read the article which I have asked to put into the RECORD, he will find that Tommy Mason was the foreman of the crew that helped to make the record on the Tuckahoe, of which so much has been said in the press, and of which our Emergency Fleet Corporation has very justly been proud; but they fail to show that the speeding up by which that record was made was done by a crew from which, as I said a moment ago, the liquor drinkers had been taken away.

Mr. President, I have some extracts, together with brief explanatory comment upon them, taken from the Emergency Fleet News, a publication issued by the Shipping Board, with the contents of which they were probably not very familiar, for they refute all the arguments and statements and suggestions which they made before the committee, which I ask that I may print as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Hon. Charles Piez, vice president and general manager of the United States Emergency Fleet Corporation, testified before the House Committee on Appropriations as follows:

"The CHAIRMAN. In that connection do they get the same ton output per man on the Atlantic and on the Pacific?

"Mr. PIEZ. No.

"The CHAIRMAN. Which is the larger?

"Mr. PIEZ. It is larger on the Pacific than the Atlantic.

"The CHAIRMAN. What do you estimate your tonnage output per man on the two oceans?

"Mr. PIEZ. About as 20 to 16 from such data as we are able to get.

"The CHAIRMAN. What is the English output?

"Mr. PIEZ. Ten.

"The CHAIRMAN. Now?

"Mr. PIEZ. I do not know as to that. That was the last reported output."

It is significant that Washington and Oregon are prohibition States on the Pacific and that where the general use of beer is insisted upon the output per man is even less than on the Atlantic, where Mr. Colby, of the Shipping Board, insists the output will be diminished if we prohibit beer.

The United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation issues a paper called The Emergency Fleet News, which Mr. Colby may not have had time to read. It contains some very interesting and significant information, however, in view of his testimony. In issue No. 2, volume 1, of March 11, 1918, on page 6, is a statement to the effect that a telegram advises Charles Piez that "the Pacific coast is still establishing new records in ship construction." The message announces that the Skinner & Eddy plant, at Seattle, a plant under prohibition, delivered to the Shipping Board February 26 the steamship West Arrow at noon and at 5 o'clock the same afternoon it launched the steamship Canoga. The article goes on to say:

"The latter vessel was originally promised for delivery June 21, but so fast is the work going forward that the company hopes to have her completed about March 20, or three months ahead of schedule. This makes a total of seven ships of 61,600 tons delivered from the five ways of the Skinner & Eddy plant during the four winter months. Word comes that this concern, which already has established a world's record in launching a ship, is endeavoring to expedite the program still further."

In recognition of the accomplishment Mr. Piez telegraphed the company:

"It is needless for me to tell you how gratified the Fleet Corporation is at the great work you are doing. The record on the Canoga and the promised delivery are such as to entitle you to the highest commendation."

In No. 8, of April 22, on page 3, is an article headed "West still sets pace for country. Skinner & Eddy Co. delivers all contract vessels to-day. Head of firm challenges Atlantic shipyards." The article begins:

"West coast builders are still leading the country in actual production of ships for our new merchant marine. The Skinner & Eddy Co., at Seattle, has delivered the only four contract ships completed to-day."

Another congratulatory telegram was sent the company by Mr. Cox, head of the Division of Steel Ship Construction, reading as follows:

"Congratulations on delivery of the fourth contract vessel. As you know, all contract vessels to date have been delivered by you. We are very much encouraged by your performance and look to you to keep it up. It is particularly gratifying to know that you have delivered this vessel 11½ weeks in advance of your contract schedule date."

On page 9 of the same issue is another article regarding the West Grove as follows:

"Another world's record was broken on March 27 when the steamship West Grove glided into the water 70 days (61 working-days) after the laying of the keel. This achievement transfers the blue ribbon from the Skinner & Eddy corporation to the Columbia River Shipbuilding Co., but the distinction of setting new standards for speed still belongs to the Puget Sound district." The article ends as follows:

"The builders have promised to break this record in the near future."

On page 10 of the same issue is a statement made by Mr. Bloomfield, head of the industrial service department of the corporation, which does not indicate very much dissatisfaction with the lack of a supply of beer. He says:

"The most significant factor about the Pacific coast shipbuilding industry is the fine spirit that is developing among the workmen. I met with every labor group on the Pacific coast covering all the shipyard trades. In every case the conference wound up with the men sending a personal message to Mr. Hurley and Mr. Piez, pledging their utmost effort and most patriotic cooperation to put the new merchant marine into the water on schedule time.

In No. 9, on page 2, is a chart showing the ratings of yards on the basis of rivets driven per way and an article headed "Pacific riveters lead in averages, graphic chart shows West coast far ahead of competitors, Skinner & Eddy set pace for Nation." The article states, and the chart shows, that the Pacific-coast division drove rivets in the week ending March 30 at the rate of nearly 30,000 per way; while the North Atlantic section drove rivets for that week at the rate of about nine or ten thousand rivets per way. This article states that District 8, which includes all of the State of Washington except the Columbia River yard is ahead of all competitors with almost 32,000 rivets driven per way, and that the Skinner & Eddy plant, which leads the country in delivery of ships, also leads all yards in rivet driving with 43,000 rivets per way.

On pages 8 and 9 of this issue are interesting charts showing the rate of construction compared with promised delivery of steel ships and the statement is made that such charts will appear regularly in the News thereafter. The Pacific division is shown to lead very decidedly all the other districts.

On page 12 is an item headed "Skinner & Eddy set new launching record. Seattle concern turns out 8,800-ton freighter in 55 days." The article says:

"Another launching record has been broken by the Skinner & Eddy Co. of Seattle. This plant which set a hot pace for both launching and deliveries some time ago was not content to see a competitor holding a launching record more than a few days. When the Columbia River Shipbuilding Co. sent an 8,800-ton freighter into the water in 61 days, breaking the Skinner & Eddy mark of 64 days, the Seattle plant came back with a record of 55 days from laying of keel to launching." And in the same article it is stated that "The Skinner & Eddy corporation also has established a new record for delivery with the completion of the 8,800-ton freighter Ossinecke. This vessel was delivered to the Shipping Board 109 days after the date that the keel was laid."

The article gives some additional interesting information in regard to other ships.

In volume 10, on page 5, is a list of 25 ships built in shortest time graphically depicted by a chart which it is stated will be duplicated from month to month. The article states that "The records of the leading 25 (yards) are presented in comparative form showing that the best mark was made by Skinner & Eddy, of Seattle, in district No. 8, by turning out an 8,800-ton vessel in 108." The article closes as follows:

"In this chart it will be observed that Skinner & Eddy holds 8 of the 25 leading positions, a fact that may be regarded as a challenge not only to the 75 yards not listed but to the others now included."

On page 7 of this issue is an article headed "Wood-ship launching sets new world record. Grant Smith-Porter Co. gets vessel off ways in 54 days." The article says:

"What is said to be a world record in wood-ship launching was established Saturday, April 20, when the Wakam, a 3,500-ton vessel of the Hough type, was launched in the yards of the Grant Smith-Porter Ship Co. at Portland, Oreg. This vessel was built in 54 working days. The company has made a record by launching nine wooden boats since February 17, 1918."

It should be called to Mr. Colby's attention that Portland, Oreg., is in dry territory. In this number beginning on page 1 is an account of a monthly dinner given at the Ebbitt by the Emergency Fleet Corporation to Maj. Gen. Peyton C. March, Acting Chief of Staff. Note this significant statement made by Hon. William Pigott, district supervisor of the Northwest:

"We have men working in the shipyards drawn from every profession and every craft," said Mr. Pigott. "We have lawyers and doctors and, most of our States now being dry, many bartenders and saloon keepers." This is an awfully good suggestion as to how we can increase our shipbuilding efficiency through prohibition.

In No. 11, of May 13, will be found a series of graphic charts showing the progress of construction on steel ships and an article headed "Pacific coast tops construction chart." It is stated "The charts show the Pacific coast leads the north Atlantic coast by a ratio of about 7⅞ to 5½. It also says: "A comparison of districts on a basis of total construction shows the eighth district, which includes Washington and Oregon at the top." It also says: "In the comparison of yards, Skinner & Eddy again tops the list."

In No. 12, of May 20, on page 11, is a chart and an article headed "Chart shows speed in wood launchings; Grant Smith-Porter Co. leads competitors in fast construction." The article says: "There are 10 yards listed in this chart, and of these the Grant Smith-Porter Co. is listed seven times, holding first, second, fourth, seventh, eighth, ninth, and tenth places. Thus the Grant Smith-Porter Co. easily demonstrates that it is leading the field in wood-ship launching." The workmen of this company are without their beer.

In No. 16, dated June 17, are charts showing the ratings of yards on the basis of rivets driven per way per week for the four-week period ending May 25, 1918, and an article headed "Coast's riveting lead continues to increase." The article says:

"Other parts of the country are following far behind districts 7 and 8 on the Pacific coast in rivet driving per way per week. Among the States as already indicated in the district returns Washington and Oregon ways lead the rest of the country."

WASHINGTON, D. C.,
August 27, 1918.

To the MEMBERS OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES:

As General Secretary of the Board of Temperance of the Methodist Episcopal Church, authorized to speak in behalf of the entire denomination, which has some 10,000,000 constituents, I ask the privilege of laying before you the following considerations which concern the form of the so-called war prohibition amendment to the agricultural bill:

1. There is an intense, almost violent, feeling of resentment in every section of the country because our war policy relating to the brewing of alcoholic liquors has not been determined by the same considerations which have governed restrictions on consumption and prohibitions applying to the people as a whole. The brewing industry has had a special privilege which menaces the successful conduct of the war.

2. Particularly in view of the unsatisfactory fuel situation, which is by authoritative voice attributed to the drink trade, we feel that a vote to delay unnecessarily war prohibition not only menaces the Nation's industries, but is a vote for the suffering of little children during the coming winter.

3. The prospective drafting of boys under age is prompting an insistent demand for more comprehensive measures of protection, such as can be afforded only by nation-wide prohibition.

In view of these things we earnestly urge that prohibition be made to apply to the liquor business not later than January 1, and preferably before that date. The liquor industry has had ample warning, having maintained its existence to the distress of the country for more than a year and only by obstructive methods.

Respectfully yours,

CLARENCE TRUE WILSON,
General Secretary,
Board of Temperance of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

August 28, 1918.

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES,
UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The National Dry Federation, representing more than thirty national and State religious, reform, civic, and patriotic organizations, with an aggregate membership of more than 25,000,000, respectfully prays the United States Senate to vote in favor of national prohibition of all alcoholic beverages for the period of the war and demobilization, and to make the same effective at the earliest possible date compatible with the public welfare.

We believe that patriotism, efficiency, economy, and humanity present and future, justify and require such action by your honorable body.

On behalf of the federation, I have the honor to be,
Most respectfully,

CHAS. SCANLON,
General Secretary.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. PENROSE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. PENROSE. I merely wish to give notice of an amendment which I shall introduce; but I will wait.

Mr. SMOOT. I will yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. PENROSE. I merely desire to state that I intend, after the disposal of the amendment submitted by the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], to propose an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], so as to make clear the contention that distilled spirits, wine, and beer may continue to be manufactured for medicinal and sacramental purposes. The sentence next to the last in the first paragraph of the amendment reads:

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue is hereby authorized and directed to prescribe rules and regulations, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, in regard to the—

There I would insert the words "manufacture, sale, and"—removal of distilled spirits held in bond after June 30, 1919, until this act shall cease to operate, for other than beverage purposes; also in regard to the—

I would there insert the word "manufacturer," so as to read:

Manufacture, sale, and distribution of wine for sacramental, medicinal, or other beverage uses.

I will ask the Secretary to draw the amendment up in some intelligent form, and I will submit it to the Senator from Texas for his examination.

Mr. ROBINSON. I call attention to the fact that in the copy of the amendment which the Senator from Pennsylvania has been using the word "than" is left out before the word "beverage" in the last line. It should read "medicinal or other than beverage purposes" in order to make it conform to the object of the legislation.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I know that nothing I can say will change the result that has been decided upon, and I may vote for the substitute amendment offered by the Senator from Texas, but I want to call attention to the fact that on July 11, 1917, when the food-control bill was under consideration, I offered an amendment under which I believe if it had been adopted no person engaged in the manufacture of distilled spirits could have justly made complaint. Every dollar would have been returned to him with a profit, and prohibition would have been in effect immediately. There would have been no necessity of the ineffective measure which is proposed at this time. Upon that occasion, Mr. President, I offered the following amendment:

Provided, That the President of the United States be, and hereby is, directed to take over for and on behalf of the Government of the United States all distilled liquors that are held in bond at the time this act goes into effect, and he is hereby authorized to pay the owners of such liquors the actual cost of the same plus a profit not exceeding 10 per cent.

At the time that bill was under consideration there were 208,000,000 gallons of distilled spirits in bond. A part of it was bottled, but the great bulk of it was in barrels. The cost of manufacturing that liquor did not exceed 30 to 32 cents per gallon. With a profit of 10 per cent upon it, allowing for the bottling of all that had been so treated, even allowing 75 cents a gallon for all of it, and even though the Government of the United States should never use a gallon of it, it would have cost the people of the United States only $150,000,000. I noticed in the newspapers the other day a list of 52 names of residents of the State of Kentucky alone who, through the sale of distilled spirits at the increased price, have been made millionaires or multimillionaires. The $150,000,000 which it would have cost if the Government had not used a drop of the distilled spirits in bond at that time would have been a mere bagatelle compared to what those men, because of the advanced price, have made out of the people to whom they have sold perhaps one-half of the amount in bond.

At that time it was stated that such action should not be taken because it would interfere with and perhaps bring great financial loss to some of the banking institutions of the country. Mr. President, at that time no bank advanced more than the distilled spirits cost, and under that amendment the Government was to pay actual cost plus a profit of 10 per cent, so that no bank would have lost one cent. The same argument is brought up to-day for our consideration.

I can not say as much upon this point to-day as I could say at that time, for now I understand that the banks have advanced not only the cost of the stuff but greatly increased amounts based on the profits that are expected to be made through its sale. Who pays for it? Every hospital that is now using distilled spirits; the people who use it for medicinal purposes, as well as those who use it for beverage purposes.

Mr. President, it seems to me that the error was made a year ago by not then providing for nation-wide prohibition. I do not consider that the passage of this bill will be a victory for prohibition. I think it will delay the day for national prohibition. I should like to see the bill provide for prohibition now. Everyone of us hopes that before June 30, 1919, this war will be over; and this proposed legislation does not take effect until that time. God grant that the war may be over before that date. Then the same program of endeavor on the part of those who believe in nation-wide prohibition will have to begin over again; the fight will have to be made again from the beginning. New excuses will be invented, and no one can tell how soon national prohibition will be accomplished. I promise, however, now that the people of the United States are going to have nation-wide prohibition. The liquor dealers have received plenty of notice, and from now on I do not want to hear the excuse offered that by immediate action on the part of Congress there will come to these industries a great financial loss.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If the Senator from Utah is now in favor of immediate national prohibition, why did the Senator consent to that clause in the proposed amendment to the Federal Constitution which gives the industry a year in which to adjust itself before the amendment shall take effect?

Mr. SMOOT. I have already said that I was not in favor of the proposed extension of time. So far as I am personally concerned, I will say to the Senator from New York that what I think we ought to do is to provide for immediate prohibition. Evidently, however, there seems to be on the part of the majority, I will say, of this body a willingness to extend the time to June 30, 1919.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator, I think, misunderstands my question. There is a provision in the amendment to the Constitution now pending before the State legislatures which provides that in the event of the amendment being ratified by three-fourths of the States, then another year must elapse before prohibition shall take effect.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. And, as I remember, all the Senators who were in favor of national prohibition agreed at that time that it would take at least one year for these industries and for the banks to readjust themselves to prohibition. If it was right then, is it not right now?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the fact that such a provision was placed in the proposed amendment to the Federal Constitution submitted to the States is no proof that it is right. Legislation is always reached by compromise, particularly such legislation as that; and it is not always passed in the form it should be passed, as everybody knows. There would have been no harm done if the proposed constitutional amendment had been passed in such a form that it would take effect immediately upon its adoption by the necessary number of States; but in order to secure its passage through Congress and in order to meet every objection raised to it, a compromise was finally agreed to granting one year, and a similar lease of life is going to be granted in this instance, so that war prohibition will not take effect until June 30 of next year, and, as I have already stated, I hope the war will be over before that time.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I feel much inclined not to vote for this amendment. It seems that for a long time the Nation has been ready to dispose of this question finally; it appears that the Senate at a previous session of Congress was ready finally to dispose of it, and attempted to do so by adopting an amendment on the floor here to a particular bill. Twice the question of nation-wide prohibition of the liquor traffic has been postponed within a year and a half and now there is this third lease of life to be granted to it, a third favor to the liquor traffic to be extended to-day. I can see it in no other light.

The pending measure is said to be a war-time prohibition measure, and is supposed to be designed to promote the winning of the war. There are three chief factors in the winning of this war or the promotion of its successful prosecution. Those factors are soldiers, fuel, and transportation. What has been the recognized effect of the liquor traffic or indulgence in liquor upon the soldier and upon the civilian in his transformation into a soldier? We have provided by legislation that there can be no liquor sold within a certain zone around any of the encampments where the boys and men of the Nation are being trained as soldiers. We have provided that no man in all the United States of America, regardless of how many licenses he may have, can sell any liquor or any intoxicating beverage to any soldier or sailor in uniform, and we have provided that the soldiers and sailors must wear their uniforms. That is what we have thought about the baleful effect of whisky and of other liquors and their use upon the soldiers. The soldier, the man in uniform with arms in his hands to uphold the policy of the Nation and protect its interests on the field of battle, is the highest expression of the power of a nation. That shows what we have thought of the effect of liquor upon the soldier.

What has been its effect upon the fuel situation? I am not going to tell you how much fuel we use in this country nor how much is consumed by the breweries; I am not going to tell you how short the fuel supply was last winter; but I am going to tell you that there was such a shortage of fuel as required the closing down of all manufacturing industries for one week last winter in order to save coal that the people might be kept warm.

Let us go a little further into the fuel question and show the favor granted to the liquor traffic. During all the time when the fuel shortage was impending and acute no brewery in the United States of America was compelled to shut down or did close down, while other manufacturing interests and factories in the United States were shut down and closed. That is a fact, as I understand, which has never been disputed.

Let us consider for a moment the food-conservation question. We said that it was necessary, in order to feed our allies and our own Army and our people, that food must be conserved. The use of wheat and wheat products and bread was limited so that citizens were not allowed to use as much as they could buy and afford to pay for, and as much as they had been accustomed to use heretofore. Why? Because the war emergency demanded that it should not be allowed. What was the effect of that? We were forced to use bread substitutes; all kinds of bread substitutes were made and used to feed our people, because the necessity required it. It made no difference how much bread you might need or how much you could afford to buy, you were restricted to 2 ounces of the kind of bread that was permitted to be sold, and you could not buy any more. But there are 40,000,000 bushels of this good grain that could be made into bread manufactured into liquor every year, and you could go into a town where liquor is sold and you could buy one drink of beer or a bottle of beer or a cask or a carload of beer, or all the beer you could pay for. There was no restriction as to amount upon the sale of beer. That is the conservation proposition we have been treated to. The bread-making product was put into beer. You could buy only 2 ounces of bread, but you could buy all the beer you could pay for. There seems to have been some discrimination against the poor man who only desired bread in favor of the other man whose spiritual disposition, in the language of Mr. Bainbridge Colby, toward his work might be improved by the drinking of beer.

How many carloads of grain and how much of obstruction to other traffic there was, I will not go into minutely. The liquor interests have boasted that in normal times they supplied 2½ per cent of the total traffic of all manufacturing industries. The breweries required the transportation of 160,000 carloads of freight every year. I refer briefly to another matter.

There is a man on the Shipping Board in this war emergency who not only believes that the use of intoxicating liquors is conducive to the efficient production of ships, but who believes that it improves the spiritual welfare and attitude of mind of the laborer toward his labor. That man is none other than one Mr. Bainbridge Colby. I voted for his confirmation when it came before the Senate, I suppose. This Mr. Bainbridge Colby came before a committee of the Senate and made a statement about the effect of the prohibition of the liquor traffic and the sale and consumption of liquor on men engaged in this war emergency in the building of ships. and he said it reduced their efficiency about 25 per cent. I quote the following from his statement:

We believe, and it is an opinion formed deliberately after much consultation and interchange of opinion, that the effect of this bit of legislation would be to reduce the efficiency of the workers in the shipyards and to reduce their output of tonnage by a very substantial amount.

A little further along he goes on to say:

But I have heard the statement made by men who are in very close touch with the work going on in shipyards that the diminution in output which they apprehend as the indirect result of this legislation will certainly be 25 per cent.

That is what Mr. Bainbridge Colby says. Let us go a little further and see what else:

And if you realized the pains that we have been to to develop in the shipyards that spiritual attitude toward the work, that morale on the part of the worker, which is a combination of encouragement and reward—

And so forth.

We have actually a man on the Shipping Board, in this war emergency, who thinks the spiritual attitude of the workmen in the building of ships, which are so imperatively needed, is increased and improved by supplying them alcohol and making them drunk.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The spiritual side he is talking about is the spirits—the alcohol.

Mr. KIRBY. I do not understand the nice distinction that this man had in his mind. This Mr. Bainbridge Colby thought so much of this opinion that he came before the Senate committee investigating the subject when this matter was under consideration and made a carefully prepared statement, and the liquor interests, or the editor, thought so much of it that they printed his statement the next day in the Washington Times. Here it is [exhibiting]. Look at it. A full page, with glaring headlines and display type. I do not know whether Mr. Bainbridge Colby handed this statement to the paper or those conducting the liquor traffic for publication before he submitted it to the committee or not, but he talks more like the paid agent of a consolidated brewery than he does like a war-industry captain or a member of the Shipping Board, whose opinion ought to be regarded so far as legislation is concerned.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. KIRBY. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. May I say to the Senator, in fairness to Mr. Colby, that he afterwards came before the committee and claimed that he was greatly shocked that his evidence was published in the newspapers. It was disclosed that its publication was paid for by Mr. Crane, who, as I remember, is one of the counsel of the brewing industry.

Mr. KIRBY. I should think that Mr. Colby would disclaim any such conduct indicating that he had prepared this statement and handed it out to the saloon interests before he made it to the committee. That statement was published in the Washington Times the next day, and it looks like an advertisement. It is published in large-faced type, but not marked advertisement. It would have been so marked, of course, had it been paid for.

I have been instructed, amused, and diverted frequently by the editorials of the versatile and brilliant but erratic editor of the Washington Times. He very frequently refers to the Holy Scriptures in his editorials, but I suggest that there has been, so far as the editorial policy of his paper is concerned, a singular discrimination in the particular portions of the scriptures that he fails to quote in his articles advocating the continuance of the liquor traffic.

The distinguished Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] talked about wine and told what a wonderful beverage it is and how cheering and comforting and improving it is to the human race, but I am going to read, on account of his speech, a quotation from an old volume which was held in high regard by the mothers and fathers of this Republic, an old volume whose teachings are still believed in beyond the Halls of the United States Senate among the people of this country who are demanding war-time prohibition of a Senate which is overwhelmingly in favor of it. I am going to read from Proverbs, what are said to be the statements of the wisest man of all times, who had had wide experience, and who certainly acquired wisdom therefrom in addition to being divinely endowed therewith:

29. Who hath woe, who hath sorrow, who hath contentions, who hath babblings, who hath wounds without cause, who hath redness of eyes.
30. They that tarry long at the wine. They that go to seek mixed wine.
31. Look not thou upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth his colour in the cup, when it moveth itself aright.
32. At the last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder.

That does not seem to be in accord with the views of the Senator from California. That quotation is taken from Proverbs, and to the Senators who are not familiar with it——

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I think much of the wine produced in California is white wines, and the quotation does not apply to them. [Laughter.]

Mr. KIRBY. That may be so, but the effect seems to be somewhat the same. I intended to quote the particular proverb there, fearing that the Senate might not be altogether familiar or conversant with it; but you have the language, and you probably will be able to find the quotation.

Here is an excerpt from another authority. Headlines: "Doctors Sound Doom of Drink for All Time. Told the Evil Will Not Be Resurrected After the War."

Here is the statement of the president of the American Medical Association. Here is what he says about this favored traffic that has been permitted to engulf, you might say, the people of this country for so long:

There can be no doubt of the injurious effects of alcoholic drinks on both the physical and mental well-being of our population. There can be no doubt that the greatest single factor we can control in the interests of the public health of the Nation would be the elimination of alcoholic drink.

Then he goes on to talk about the evils that have been fastened upon the people of the world by government by autocratic power of the world, and he winds up in this way:

Among these great wrongs, too long tolerated, none has done more injury to mankind than drink. And science and education should eliminate not only the plagues and epidemics but also the curse of drink from the world.

He says it is the greatest injury to the public health that there is or can be. Now, what are the reasons for waiting until next year to put into force this war-time prohibition act? I want to mention just a little more the record made by this other shipyard—not the one that Mr. Bainbridge Colby over here controls, but this other shipyard that built the ship in 27 days and 5 hours, the fastest time in the history of all the world. Mr. Schwab said to the builder of this particular ship: "What is the secret employed in your shipyards that you have done this singularly wonderful thing? What is the secret of such a wonderful performance?" And this man replied, in language more forceful than elegant, "No booze!" Has our other great shipyard ever built a ship in 27 days and 5 hours? No; because the other man, Colby, thinks that you must have alcohol, and you must have wine, and you must have it distributed to and used by the men who are engaged in the work; otherwise you lose 25 per cent of efficiency, he says, and discourage "that spiritual attitude toward the work" which should be encouraged by the use of stimulants and alcoholic liquor.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. KIRBY. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If the Senator will pardon me, I want to suggest to him that the amendment we are discussing now recognizes the force of his contention by saying that for the conservation of man power in the construction of ships we are going to stop the manufacture and sale of liquor next June. It is all right, apparently, to waste our man power between now and next June, but next June we are going to conserve.

Mr. KIRBY. The Government, both executive and legislative departments, has determined that the efficiency of the soldier is not promoted by the drinking of liquor. It has absolutely prohibited his getting an opportunity to indulge in it. All the great industrial concerns of this country have long recognized this condition and have prohibited the use of it by their operatives in so far as they were able to do it; and the record-breaking shipbuilding concern has said it was enabled to surpass the record of manufacture of all time and make a ship complete in 27 days and 5 hours because there was no booze permitted the employees engaged upon the work.

We need these ships made in 27 days and 5 hours, or 30 days and 5 hours, or as rapidly as they can be made. My own view about it, based on my observation of the liquor traffic and its effect on the human race and the efficiency of the men who indulge in it from the time I first came to notice it up to now, is that we might promote efficiency in shipbuilding not only by having sober workmen, who do not believe that their spiritual attitude toward their work is elevated by the drinking of alcoholic stimulants, but also by having some man in charge of that great industry who also knows that to be the case.

I say to you frankly to-day that if I had had any idea that we had a man on the Shipping Board in charge of that great work who would think that the efficiency of his labor would be reduced 25 per cent by keeping men sober, I would not in a million years have voted for his confirmation.

His testimony has been published here as an argument in favor of the continuance of the liquor traffic for another year on the part of the favored interest which was not required to quit the manufacture of beer last year when other industries were shut down to save fuel; the favored interest which has been allowed to sell a man all the beer he could drink, manufactured and composed of food products, without regard to how much he needed or could use, when that same regulation has prevented a man from buying more than 2 ounces of bread, regardless of how much money he had. The Washington Times published that Colby testimony as a full-page advertisement, and yet did not mark it an advertisement. If it did not publish it as an advertisement, did it publish it as something conducive to the improvement of the Government service, the belief and opinion of experts, that ought to be brought to the attention of the United States Senate in the papers rather than by the report of the committee that had the subject in charge; or did it publish it because it reflected this editor's own individual ideas of what should be done in the way of legislation, or what should be done to protect certain interests? It struck me as so flagrant and outrageous, an atttempted exercise of the influence supposed to be possessed by a man in charge of a great Government institution upon the legislation proposed in the United States Senate that I could not say less about it than I have said here to-day.

Twice we have postponed taking definite and final action here. All the people seem in favor of it, and yet we are again asked to give one year more of life to this traffic, which has been regarded as an outlaw, and subject to police regulation, from the foundation law in the distant past. They say it is not fair to enact such legislation as will prevent the man who is engaged in this traffic from disposing of his liquor. Of course, I do not blame him for wanting to get out without a loss. Why is it not fair? When he engaged in the manufacture of this stuff he knew that it was a business subject to regulation, restriction, and prohibition. He knew that he lived on the license of the Government, and that he could not continue without the license of the Government.

He knew that under all the precedents and under all the authorities and under all the practices, when the time came and the people said by law, "This traffic shall be prohibited," there was no legal obligation upon the part of any government, State, or city to reimburse him for liquor that he had manufactured thinking he would be permitted to sell it.

If we are going to have war-time prohibition in time to conserve food and fuel and conduce to the efficiency of our soldiers and our workmen, it is about time we had it; and if the people of the United States are insistently demanding it and the United States Senate has a two-thirds majority in favor of it, it does not seem to me that there is any necessity for putting it off another year.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, before making a few observations on the amendment as a whole may I ask the Senator from Texas what his understanding is of the meaning of this phrase:

> The termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President?

As I understand it, "demobilization" in its ordinary sense is descriptive of the period of time following the war during which the soldiers of the recent belligerents shall have all been discharged and gone to their homes. Is that the understanding of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. SHEPPARD. All those who serve for the particular period of this emergency, as I understand; all except the Regular Army.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes. What is the Senator's idea—and he may answer, if he is willing to, in my time—of the duration of this demobilization period, before it is accomplished, after this war is over? May I say, as illustrating the information I want to get, that it is to be fairly assumed that we will have 4,000,000 men in the United States Army, all of them enlisted for the period of the war, overseas at the end of this war, and that the demobilization, of course, can not be complete until they are all brought home and discharged and sent to their homes, which may take two years. It will have taken more than two years to get them over there; it certainly will take at least one year and perhaps two years to bring them back. Does the Senator believe that that phrase, "the termination of demobilization," is a wise one to put in this bill?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It was put in with a view to the probability that the war might end much sooner than we thought.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh! Then this is something more than war prohibition?

Mr. SHEPPARD. No; I consider the period of demobilization a part of the war. It is the necessary aftermath of the war.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator has just said it was put in with the idea that the war might end a little sooner than was anticipated.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I meant by that the termination of actual hostilities.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But may I suggest, Mr. President, that if this is in fact, as it is claimed to be, a war prohibition measure and is being urged upon that ground, there can not be much strength to the contention that it should be continued in force for a year or 18 months after the war has ceased.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Technically, of course, the war ceases with the actual conflict; but so far as prohibition is concerned it would be quite as necessary to protect the situation until demobilization as in actual conflict.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No, Mr. President; the soldiers are protected from the liquor traffic in any event.

Mr. BORAH. They are if they are stationed at particular points.

Mr. WADSWORTH. They are protected while in uniform.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. In Europe?

Mr. BORAH. I saw an article in the New York Times the other day which demonstrated very thoroughly that they are not protected when they are in uniform if they are in people's houses, and it was a very urgent plea upon the part of an officer that the people who invited them to their houses cease giving them liquor.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not prepared to answer the suggestion of the Senator from Idaho, but I fail to see wherein this bill gives the slightest relief to that situation.

Mr. BORAH. Perhaps not that particular situation, but numerous instances might arise where it would be just as essential to protect the situation of the men until they were back at home as it was during the time they were actually a part of the fighting forces.

Mr. WADSWORTH. My purpose in making the inquiry was this, in brief: I understand that this legislation has been pressed because it is believed, and confidently believed, that it will be conducive to the productive energies of the United States in support of the war; and yet I find upon reading the amendment—which, although I am a member of the committee, I never saw until just now—that it is to continue in effect for at least a year or 18 months after the productive energies of the United States are no longer needed for the waging of the war. I ask the Senator from Texas to explain why that was put in, and he answers: "It was put in because we believed it possible that the war might end sooner than we anticipated." Therefore I believe my contention is right when I say that this is much more than a war prohibition measure. Further than that, Mr. President, the fact that its application is postponed until June 30, 1919, brands it as scarcely war prohibition at all. There can be no question whatsoever about it. As a war prohibition measure, Senators, this bill is a fake.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator is making a suggestion now which finds a great deal of response in my mind; and if those who are in favor of making it a war prohibition measure, together with the men who entertain the views of the able Senator from New York, will stand together we will put it in operation long before the 30th of June, 1919. I think it ought to go into operation just as soon as it is possible to pass it through the Senate and make it operative.

Mr. WADSWORTH. My purpose in making that observation was not to indulge in an argument upon prohibition but to expose this bill, for it is labeled "war prohibition" and it is not war prohibition; it will be advertised as war prohibition, and campaigns will be waged with this as an issue, and many will seek votes upon it.

Mr. President, this legislation has had a very peculiar history. I have been a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry during most of the discussion of this topic. With some of the proposals—not with all, but with some of the proposals—I have been in sympathy, and have so stated before the committee, and upon a prior occasion in the Senate, and before the public. But as the months have gone by, Mr. President, and one suggestion after another has been made by different proponents of this kind of legislation, the attitude of mind or the details upon which they have agreed from time to time, I notice, has constantly changed. There has been no stability of opinion on the part of the backers of this kind of legislation.

First it was suggested—and I supported the suggestion—that the manufacture of distilled spirits should be prevented in the United States during this war. I would go further. I would have gone further then, and so stated upon the floor of the Senate. I would have voted then for the prohibition of the sale of distilled spirits during this war and for all time to come in the United States. That position was frankly taken, but that, apparently, was further than the proponents of prohibition, generally speaking, were willing to go, for some reason or other, I know not what; and the Congress, in which they had a majority in both Houses, confined its action to the prohibition of the manufacture of distilled spirits during this war, and gave to the President the right, in his discretion, to prohibit the manufacture of beer and wine or to limit the alcoholic content of those beverages. The President has exercised that discretion with respect to the alcoholic content of beer, having reduced it to 2¾ per cent.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator will notice the last clause of this amendment, he will observe that it in express terms continues in force section 15 of the so-called food-conservation law. The two seem to me to be inconsistent. If I am correct in regard to that conclusion, then does it not follow that this is not a war-prohibition measure, for the reason that it contains a clause which defeats itself by preserving to the President all the authority and discretion with which he was heretofore clothed under the food-conservation act?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from Colorado has but confirmed my estimate of this bill. Discretion will still lie in the hands of the President to further reduce the alcoholic content of beer, or to prohibit its manufacture altogether until May next.

Mr. THOMAS. Or to permit its manufacture.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Or to permit its manufacture; yes; and the same with wine. But following the action of the Congress last year, which was then accepted, I believe, by a very large number of people in the United States as the wisest solution which the friends of prohibition had to offer, and which they themselves never denounced, of which they themselves for some time thereafter apparently were exceedingly proud, new suggestions began to be made, some of them indicating a lack of confidence in the President, in that he had not exercised the discretion placed in his hands by them in a manner which would be conducive to the further advertising of this movement.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator, as he says, is a member of the committee that reported the food act that contained the proviso he is talking about. I want to ask the Senator if it is not true that that committee, before it reported the provision giving this power to the President, had reported, after an extended hearing, an absolute prohibition against the use of cereals and other foods in the manufacture of beer; and is it not true that after that action was taken, at the request of the President himself that committee was reassembled, and, following out that request of the President, that action was reconsidered, and the particular language was put in that has been in the food act ever since?

I want to say to the Senator that I was one member of the committee who voted in favor of reporting out the first absolute prohibition, and I was against reconsideration, and was opposed to its modification so as to give to the President the power to prohibit, instead of enacting it as a statute on the part of Congress.

Have I not stated the true analysis and history of that particular legislation?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from Nebraska has described it accurately; but he does not, to my mind, quite account for the present situation. The Senator says very truly that the friends of war prohibition last year yielded to the request of the President to the extent that they left beer and wine alone and left that matter in his discretion to regulate; that the friends of prohibition yielded to the President's request. Since then the same friends of prohibition have agitated and agitated and agitated for actual war-time prohibition by act of Congress, and yet when the time comes when they can put it through they once more yield to the request of the President and bring in a bill which is not war-time prohibition.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator again?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York further yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the Senator if, in his judgment, there is any inconsistency in the position taken by Members of the Senate or of Congress who were opposed to reconsidering that positive legislation and giving the power to the President instead of making it a real law, in advocating, even after that was done, the enactment of a more drastic prohibitory war measure?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I would not label it inconsistency. I believe that men have a right to change their minds and to move on toward a better condition of affairs if such a proposal appeals to them, and I am not criticizing the men who yielded last year.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator does not understand my question. I am not speaking of those who yielded. The Senator speaks of this agitation. At least those who did not yield are not inconsistent, it seems to me.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, no, no.

Mr. NORRIS. Those are the ones I am speaking for.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But the fact remains that, wisely or unwisely, the legislation now before the Senate can not be truthfully and accurately described as a war-time prohibition measure. The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] has read a letter, a very touching one, illustrative of the necessity of war-time prohibition. I am in very deep sympathy with the sentiments expressed by the author of that letter, who asks, in effect, the aid of the Congress to save a man from the curse of liquor, particularly while the war is going on; and yet this bill subjects that man to the curse of liquor until June 30, 1919. So I say this bill is falsely labeled and it should be so understood.

I am not in agreement with all of the proposals that have been made by the friends of prohibition. I have stated so before. I recognize, however, some of the very, very grave evils incident to the liquor traffic. From the bottom of my heart I wish that they could be eliminated. My convictions as to how they might be best eliminated, most permanently eliminated, and the whole question removed from the political field, are not entertained by the majority of this body. I can not help observing that under the terms of this amendment as now proposed and as offered by the Senator from Texas, the most innocent people of all in any way connected, remotely or directly, with the so-called liquor traffic—the people who are engaged in that branch of it which is harmless—are the only ones hurt. I refer to the men who till the soil in the raising of wine grapes. Their crop of this year, now ripening upon the vines, if this bill passes can not be sold—that is conceded—and their year of labor is gone, their investment is ruined; and they are the only people who will inevitably suffer any serious financial catastrophe by reason of the passage of this act.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. Is not the Senator mistaken in that suggestion? Would not the Government of the United States lose a very large revenue consequent upon the destruction of this crop?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I was not regarding the Government as the people in this discussion. Of course, it will have a direct effect upon the Treasury.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I had reference to the different groups of people, good or bad, all human beings nevertheless, trying to make a little estimate as to the imperative treatment that Congress now threatens to give them. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand the Senator to state that the banks and financial institutions which are supposed to have been very much interested in this bill are fully protected from any possible injury under the bill?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; I do not believe they are fully relieved from possible injury. The testimony on that point is somewhat conflicting. The Committee on Agriculture was told yesterday that the Comptroller of the Currency believes that six or seven months would be a sufficient length of time during which the banks might readjust their loans and financial connections with the distilling trade. I am not sure that that is long enough. It may be. The bill gives them that length of time. The banks say it will take another six months, but there is a conflict of testimony on that point. At least, they get six or eight months. But the farmers who appeared before the Agricultural Committee yesterday from the grape district in New York, whose grapes are now ripening upon the vines, and who are entirely and utterly dependent upon the marketing of this year's crop for their ability to pay their notes to the local grocery stores and meat markets and to go through the coming winter, are absolutely ruined by this bill because they can not sell their crop; and they are the only people who are hurt.

Mr. BORAH. When in the course of human events could you ever enact a prohibition bill without its affecting some one at the tail end of the controversy? That is one reason why those in favor of prohibition have been permitting this postponement and that extension and this modification and that modificaton to take place. Now, there must come a time some time, if we are going to have it at all, when it must be effectuated, and at that time if people continue to engage in the industry undoubtedly some one will get hurt. How would the Senator from New York deal with the situation at this time, assuming, as I do, that the Senator from New York wants war-time prohibition? How would he effectuate it? I will vote for any bill the Senator from New York will suggest which will effectuate war-time prohibition, and just as quickly as the Senator wants it, if he wants it as quickly as I think he does from his words. I would myself be glad to put it into effect at once. I do not like this substitute.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from Idaho has made an assumption and used a definition which may be misunderstood. I am heartily in favor of war-time temperance. I do not believe you will ever get war-time or peace-time prohibition in the sense that term is generally used, and I am not willing to support a provision that is labeled that way when I know it can not be brought about. The Senator asks me what I would suggest. I believe the trouble with this whole discussion of temperance and prohibition from its beginning has been that people have not approached it with a due sense of proportion. Certain descriptive terms have come into colloquial use in connection with the liquor question which are given universal application, and the crusade or campaign—I do not mean to deride it when I use the word "crusade"—the campaign has been characterized by the use of those terms, and no distinction made whatsoever between the different types and kinds of beverages which contain in a greater or less degree some alcohol. Everything is put down under the one term "booze." That very term has been used here on the floor of the Senate this afternoon.

My contention is this: In the interest of temperance or in the interest of war-time prohibition, if I may use that term in the sense that I mean it, the consumption of wine in this country is no part of the liquor question and never has been and never will be. The consumption of wine does not fill our almshouses; it does not fill our jails; it does not lead men to commit crime or brutalize their families. It does not become a habit. The trouble is that Congress in approaching these things has not taken into account that all the beverages should not be considered upon the same plane.

If I had my way about it, I would amend the bill, if I could, so as to permit the sale of wine. It would not injure a single shipyard. Everybody knows that it is perfect nonsense to say that the consumption of wine in this country is conducive to public intoxication and drunkenness. Look at France. The whole population drinks wine, down to little children 5 or 6 years old. I have seen them doing it myself in their open cafés.

Mr. BORAH and Mr. VARDAMAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Suppose I agree with the Senator on the proposition which he has just advanced, that wine ought to stand in a separate classification, the question is, How are we going to reach it? Is the Senator and those who think with him willing to join us in putting through immediate war-time prohibition as to all liquors except wine?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will be perfectly frank with the Senator. If I had my own way I would class beer with wine and would put prohibition on whisky, whence the evil comes.

Mr. BORAH. I am perfectly willing to agree that whisky is more injurious than beer, but I think nevertheless that beer has its evils, and I would not want to except beer. I understand, then, the Senator would prefer, if he had his way, to except or exclude both beer and wine.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; if I had my way.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, that makes it impossible for the Senator and I to agree.

Mr. WADSWORTH. We came pretty close to it.

Mr. President, I did not mean to embark on a discussion which is really not related to this bill, but I will say very frankly to Senators I have been hoping for a good many years that we could, all of us, approach this question with minds a little bit more open and not quite so filled with prejudice one way or the other. I hate the terms "wet" and "dry." They are not descriptive of common sense on either side of this question.

It has been my privilege to observe certain foreign peoples in traveling through their countries, and I never saw a drunken native. I found on inquiry it was because they were wine-drinking people. As soon as one gets into a country where distilled spirits are the habit of any number of people, then you encounter drunkenness and the liquor question injected into politics. I have believed for a long time, and I believe to-day, if the Senator from Idaho has any curiosity to know my views on the question of prohibition and the temperance question generally, if we would drive out the distilled spirits, that kind of drinking which causes maniacs to fill our asylums upon occasion, that becomes a settled and fixed habit which the victim can not throw off, that causes crime and misery and distress, you will never hear of the liquor question in or out of politics again in the United States, because there is nothing inherently vicious, inherently dangerous, wicked, or injurious in the consumption of other beverages as they are consumed by the French people and the Italian people.

Mr. BORAH. Will the Senator go so far as to say that beer is a food product and ought to be produced during the war?

Mr. WADSWORTH. A food product?

Mr. BORAH. Yes. Would it not be a conservation of food products and fuel to prohibit the manufacture of beer?

Mr. WADSWORTH. A minute drop in the bucket.

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not think so. The figures do not show that. Take the amount of coal alone which is used in the manufacture of beer and it is a tremendous item, especially when you see breweries running and schools closed for want of coal.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I agree with the Senator from Idaho and some of the comments of the Senator from Arkansas on the method in which this conservation program has been managed during this war with respect to beer and bread. It was within the power of the Federal Government to prevent the manufacture of beer, and it is now. Why is it not done as a food-conservation measure?

Mr. BORAH. If they do not see fit to do it, does not the duty devolve on us to see that it is done now? Because the Federal administrator of the law has fallen down in the execution of the law it seems all the more an argument why we should enact a different law and one which would compel the conservation of food and fuel.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If I were persuaded, even in a slight degree, that it was necessary for food conservation to prevent the manufacture of beer, I would vote to do it; but I notice the Food Administrator has sent out a notice that on September 1 next, if I remember the date correctly, the restriction on the use of wheat flour will no longer be necessary.

Mr. BORAH. He may do a good many things, but he is not a prophet. Nobody knows what will be necessary. We know this much, that we are running close to the edge upon all these propositions, and we know, if we know anything at all, that this winter will be a severe test upon the entire situation, industrially and economically, and in every other way, for that matter; and in all probability, if the United States breaks down anywhere, it will be in the industrial situation rather than in man power on the western front. We know that last winter, at a time when the schools were closed and when dwelling houses were cold and children were in need of warmth, the breweries were running at full tilt, with their full supply of coal. The Congress of the United States has no justification to permit that to continue simply because the Food Administrator did permit it to continue.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am in sympathy with the observations made by the Senator from Idaho as to the question of coal supply as well as bread supply.

There is one provision of this amendment which I think is very valuable, and that is the proviso which permits the President of the United States to mark out certain zones around mines and munition plants. To my mind, it is the only constructive thing of value in the bill. I see nothing else in the bill that will be of any immediate use to the people of the United States.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If it is necessary for the public good to give the President the power to prohibit the sale of liquor in certain zones and the President exercises that power, why should not that apply to the whole country? It is not alone a question of what effect it may have upon the people in that particular zone, but upon the people of America. It applies to the whole country quite as much as it would apply to a particular zone.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No, Mr. President; I can not quite agree with the Senator on that point. I believe the conditions differ in different parts of the country.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator knows that the steady use of alcoholic drink is detrimental to human beings. It lessens their efficiency; it is hurtful. If it is hurtful in the mines, hurtful in the munition plants, it must be so in the ordinary vocations of life.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It depends entirely upon the character of the sale, the quantity that is sold, how it is consumed, the nature of the neighborhood, the character of the population. You can not draw a rigid rule over the backs of a hundred million people. That is the only way I can answer the question of the Senator from Mississippi and explain my own view about it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I should like to have the Senator point out to me where it does any good. If it does no good, it does harm, wherever it is used, in my judgment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There are certain elements that are exceedingly harmful; there is no question about it. I am glad the amendment at least contains that provision. It will authorize the President any time before June 30 next to cure any situation which turns out to be a bad one, wherever it is, adjacent to munition plants, shipyards, or mines. I repeat, I think that is the one feature of the amendment, the only feature of the amendment, which can have any immediate beneficial effect upon the United States in the prosecution of the war. Whatever other beneficial effect will come can not come before June 30 next, and, in my judgment, will not be as beneficial as some of its proponents believe.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I presume the substitute offered by the Senator from Texas will be agreed to, and I am rather inclined to believe that it is probably the best solution of the question that under all circumstances can be obtained by those who believe in what is ordinarily called war prohibition. Personally, I have been opposed to the making of this compromise and the extension of this time.

Mr. President, when we are all united in a determination, firm and conclusive, to do everything within our power and to require everything to be done within our power for the winning of the war, for a victorious winning of the war, it seems to me that when we are told, and told truthfully, all over the country and on almost every billboard at every street corner that "food will win the war; do not waste it"; when we are reminded dozens of times every day of the importance of food, its production, and its conservation in this great struggle; when we realize the truth of it, when we study the question and reach the conclusion we must all reach—that the production and the conservation of food are necessary for victory—when we do all that, Mr. President, it seems to me we must reach the inevitable conclusion that the wasting of food in the manufacture of intoxicating liquors is an economic and a moral sin. When we realize that fuel is a necessary thing, that we must have it not only to win the war but to keep our people warm so that they may live during the winter, and then realize that millions of tons of it are used in the production of this worse than useless product, we can not reach any other conclusion than that it is the duty of patriotic men to prevent this waste, and prevent it as soon as possible.

When we realize that one of the other great questions in connection with this war is the transportation question, and that we are short of cars and other means of transportation, and that our people's lives even are dependent upon it, that the welfare of our soldiers and their protection are dependent upon it, must we not reach the conclusion that it is our duty to prevent the use of all means of transportation in carrying intoxicating liquors from one portion of the country to another?

These things are vital, they are necessary; and yet, as has been said by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], the schools are closed, our children deprived of the right of an education, temporarily, at least, in order that we may carry on the war. I am not finding fault with that. I can conceive of a time when every school must close—and they must be closed if it is necessary to win the war—but by the side of the schoolhouse with its closed doors is the brewery using hundreds of thousands of tons of coal every year in the production of beer.

Why this discrimination? Why shall we bend every energy in every direction as a war proposition and lie down in the face of the men who are engaged in the liquor business?

Mr. President, no one wants to do an injustice to any man. No one wants to take any action here that will be unjust to the man engaged in the liquor business. That accounts for some of the changes in the various amendments that have been proposed. Others have come about like this one now, because of the parliamentary situation, where those who believe it are driven almost in desperation to accept something rather than to get, probably, nothing.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I should like to ask the Senator, What is there in the parliamentary situation that compels anybody to submit to this miserable makeshift, this miserable surrender to the brewers, to sacrifice the men, women, and children of this country that they may continue to make profits?

Mr. NORRIS. I was going to discuss the parliamentary situation.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I wish the Senator would.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not want to do it right now; but since the Senator has asked me the question, instead of going into another branch of the subject I would just as lief take it up now and discuss it.

The Agricultural appropriation or food-control bill became a law over a year ago. It passed the Senate considerably over a year ago—perhaps 14 or 15 months ago. When it came before the Committee on Agriculture we took it up. We had hearings on the proposition of putting in a provision that would prohibit the use of foodstuffs and cereals in the manufacture of intoxicating liquors. We had extended hearings. We heard brewers from all over the country, and after those hearings and after a spirited contest in the committee we put that kind of a provision in the food-control act.

But after that action had been taken the President did not agree with the committee or its action, and at his request the committee reassembled and put in the provision that is now in the law and has been in the law ever since the food-control act was enacted, which gives to the President the power to change the alcoholic content and to prohibit the use of foodstuffs entirely in the manufacture of liquor at any time he sees fit. He has had that power ever since the act was passed.

Now, following that came this bill. It passed the House. It was taken up by the Committee on Agriculture in June, and we were told by the acting chairman of that committee when we assembled to consider the bill that it was a war measure; that we must support it and get it passed before the 1st day of July; that it was necessary to do it at once, and we did it at once. We ordered it reported that day, but we put in an amendment prohibiting the use of foods and cereals in the manufacture of intoxicating liquors.

Immediately haste disappeared. The committee was reassembled and that action reconsidered, like it was before in the food act. Then it was decided to have hearings. So it went on until from that time on hearings at various times were held, and delays came along, and the bill was not reported to the Senate until long after those who were so urgent about it as being a war measure expected to have it not only reported but passed.

Then the Senate will remember that the debate commenced on this bill. I will not call it a filibuster, although that would not be inappropriate, but it was a debate that lasted for days, not on the amendment, but everybody knew the debate was taking place because a prohibitory amendment was in the bill. It became apparent that an attempt was being made to kill the bill by dilatory tactics—this bill that originally had been proclaimed as a war measure all because it contained a prohibitory amendment. Then came the recess.

Now, suppose it passed as the committee reported this prohibitory amendment before the recess and that in that form it goes to conference. Does not everybody know, does not the Senator from Mississippi know, that it will be within the power of two or three men to hold up the conference report? Does he not know that the opponents can select these men? Does he not know that this bill, unless this compromise is agreed upon, probably will not get through the Senate in the next four weeks? Does he not know when it gets into conference it will not probably get out of conference until Congress adjourns? Those things may not happen, but they are possibilities. I think they are probabilities. I fear they are almost certainties. It has been thought best by those who favor it that this compromise should be accepted for fear that we will get nothing if we do not accept it.

In connection with that I want to take up the compromise amendment. I want to take up one provision of it. That reminds me, and I am calling the attention of the Senate to it now for that reason, that it has some redeeming features. The amendment of the committee for which this is offered as a substitute has war-time prohibition commencing on the 30th day of next January and ending with the close of the war. The substitute has war-time prohibition commencing on the 30th day of June, 1919, and extending beyond the war to the close of demobilization, which will in all probability mean from two to three years after the actual war is over, which will without any doubt run up to if not away beyond the time when we will have national prohibition by the adoption and going into effect of the national prohibitory amendment. In this respect it is better than the committee amendment. It does not commence so soon—not soon enough to suit me—but it will run much longer.

So it has some redeeming features. I do not like the idea of postponing it. I should like to see it go into effect sooner. I think it could go into effect according to the committee amendment that was proposed before the recess—on the 1st day of next January—without doing any financial injury.

The committee had some hearings on that subject, and among others a committee of bankers from New York City came here, and I think they made a great impression on the committee. I know they did on me. There was not anybody on the committee who wanted to bring on a financial panic or wanted to injure anybody financially. We were told that large amounts of money were loaned on the whisky in bond, and that when we made it illegal and impossible to take whisky out of bond men holding this kind of securities, of course, could not realize on it. We all knew that, and that it practically compelled those having that kind of securities to act within the short time we allowed or to lose their securities and perhaps the money they had invested. We were given to understand that these amounts were enormous, that it meant the closing of hundreds of bank doors, that with their financial connections it would undoubtedly bring on a financial panic and a run on all the banks of the country, and they presented a picture that made us hesitate.

After that hearing I thought I would try to ascertain the truth in regard to the financial condition surrounding the matter and I wrote a letter to the Comptroller of the Currency, of which I desire to read a copy to the Senate. On the 3d day of July, 1918, I addressed to the comptroller this letter:

JULY 3, 1918.

Hon. JOHN SKELTON WILLIAMS,
Comptroller of the Currency,
Treasury Department.

DEAR MR. WILLIAMS: I would like to know how much money is loaned, particularly by the banks, upon whisky now in bond. It has been represented to members of the Committee on Agriculture of the Senate, by a committee of bankers, that there is a very large amount of money loaned by the banks upon this whisky, and that many banks have loaned on such security a very large proportion of their assets. I would like to know how much is thus loaned and what proportion of the assets of the banks has been loaned in this way. If Congress prohibited the sale of whisky and the taking of whisky out of bond, what effect would such action have upon the banks? Would it make it necessary for any of such banks to close their doors? Would there be any other financial institutions connected with the banks but having no direct loans on whisky in bond so affected? If there is any danger of this kind, how long a time would it take for the banks to collect these loans and arrange their business so as to avoid any financial difficulty? In other words, if Congress desires to prohibit the sale of whisky as a beverage and the taking of such whisky out of bond, how much time should be given in order to avoid any financial difficulty?

Thanking you in advance for an early response, I am

Very truly, yours,

G. W. NORRIS.

On the 16th day of July the comptroller answered that letter as follows:

COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY,
Washington, July 16, 1918.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have your letter of the 3d instant inquiring as to the amount of money loaned by banks on whisky held in bond, but I regret to advise you that we do not have any comprehensive statistics on this subject.

I did, however, obtain in March of this year a statement as to the loans made by the national banks of Louisville, Ky.—which, as you of course know, is one of the largest distilling centers in the country—to whisky interests, directly or indirectly, secured and unsecured.

This statement showed that the national banks of Louisville, which on March 4, 1918, had combined capital of $4,995,000 and combined surplus of $2,835,000, had outstanding loans to whisky interests as follows:

Direct loans secured by collateral	$894,320
Direct loans not secured by collateral	307,590
Commercial paper secured by collateral	757,922
Commercial paper not secured by collateral	180,942
Total	2,240,774

The total loans of these banks on March 4, 1918, amounted to $41,517,000.

It may reasonably be presumed that the banks in other distilling centers also have comparatively large amounts loaned to the whisky interests on the security of receipts covering whisky held in bond and otherwise.

While legislation prohibiting the sale of whisky and the withdrawal of whisky from bond during the period of the war would probably result in the tying up during that period of funds of banks invested in loans of the character mentioned, I do not believe that any of the national banks would be forced to close their doors on that account.

It would seem to me advisable that such legislation as is proposed should provide that a period of, say, six months should elapse before the prohibition should become effective. I believe this would be a reasonable length of time to allow for the necessary adjustment.

Sincerely, yours,

JOHN SKELTON WILLIAMS.

Hon. G. W. NORRIS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. VARDAMAN. What is the date of that letter?

Mr. NORRIS. It is dated July 16, 1918.

Mr. President, it seems to me that that disposes of the objection that the financial interests are so involved, through the banks, in the whisky business and that war-time prohibition would bring financial disaster to the country or to any of the banks. You will note that in the city of Louisville the national banks had total loans amounting to $41,517,000, and that just a little over $2,000,000 of that $41,517,000 was loaned, directly and indirectly, on whisky. With six months' time, as suggested by the Comptroller of the Currency, there can be no doubt that all those banks would be able to save themselves without any difficulty or danger whatever.

I could favor this substitute only on the theory that it is the best that can be obtained at this time.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I desire to ask the Senator whether he does not feel that it would be worth while to try and see whether or not this is the best which can be obtained?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Let the Senate vote upon the matter and see whether it will postpone the time when the law shall go into effect.

Mr. NORRIS. I remember what happened in reference to the wheat amendment on the Agricultural bill, where the bill went into conference early in April and never came out until July; when all the items except that one were agreed to within a day or two after the conference began; when merely by the power of numbers the House conferees refused to do anything and held the matter intact without anything being done. That can also be done with this bill.

Mr. VARDAMAN. But we shall get no immediate relief by the passage of this bill.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that; I am not going to argue that with the Senator; I dislike that just as much as he does; but, as I have said to him, we shall, on the other end, get more relief than we will under the other proposition, and that will not conserve the food, in which I am particularly interested. I think the legislation ought to go into effect much sooner.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I wish the Senator from Nebraska would throw the weight of his influence and his vote in that direction and would let us see if we can not put the law into effect much sooner and not surrender to the demand which has come in here to postpone it. As a matter of fact, I do not look for any war prohibition at all under this bill. The probabilities are that when the time comes some revenue or other contingency will arise which will postpone the date of the legislation taking effect still further.

Mr. NORRIS. If this bill goes into effect this is what it will accomplish, in my judgment: It will mean absolute prohibition after the 30th of June next up to the time when the constitutional amendment goes into effect, because it will not only mean prohibition from June 30 during the war, but it will mean prohibition during demobilization, which, as I understand, will mean after our troops shall have been brought back and sent home. With the ships at our disposal it will be a physical impossibility for that to take place in less than two years, at least, as I understand. So that, so far as the prohibitory part of the law is concerned, there is not any doubt that it will hold its sway until the national prohibition amendment, which it is conceded will be ratified by a sufficient number of the States next spring, goes into effect, which will be one year after it has been approved by a sufficient number of the legislatures. I would rather have it the other way; I would rather that the war-time prohibition should go into effect on the 30th day of December next, as the committee reported it; but I fear from our experience as to legislation that is opposed as this is, both in and out of official life, that the danger is that this Congress would adjourn without any prohibition legislation whatever.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Would not the Congress have an opportunity to take the matter up again this winter?

Mr. NORRIS. I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I say, if we can not now get what we want and what the Senator from Nebraska desires, if Congress should adjourn without the passage of a bill putting prohibition into effect on the 1st of December next, we would have time at the session next winter to enact such legislation.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Mississippi does not expect to accomplish anything at that time, does he?

Mr. VARDAMAN. We have everything to gain and nothing to lose by fighting.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but the Senator knows in advance that if this legislation is not passed at this session there will be no opportunity to pass such a bill in the short session of Congress; that will be practically an impossibility. If the Senator will look over the history of such legislation from the beginning and remember what we have accomplished—we have accomplished something, it is true—he will find that we have not accomplished what those who believe in war-time prohibition and conservation desire to accomplish. What headway we have made, the Senator will realize, is the result of our endeavors embracing nearly two years, and that as yet we have not got much, if anything, as the result of our efforts.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If the Senator will pardon me another interruption, I desire to say that I think it would be better to let the responsibility rest with those who defeat prohibition legislation and to go on and fight for something that means some advantage to the people and to the Government by putting a law into effect at once or as early as it can be done.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, I believe that we ought to try to be practical, and, as I said before, in the conferences which have gone on personally I have objected to this compromise; I have not been in favor of agreeing to such legislation; and yet I may be wrong and the others may be right. I know they are acting in good faith and doing what they believe to be the best. Looking at it fairly, I can not help but admit that probably, judging from our past experience and what we know the present condition to be and the powers that are fighting us, they are probably right and that we will not be able to get anything other than that which is now proposed. I would rather, therefore, get this, for I think it will be a great deal accomplished. It means, in my judgment, the end of whisky and of the liquor traffic on the 30th day of June next forever. I do not think there is any doubt about that; and that is worth much, even if it does not commence as soon as it should.

Mr. President, the argument has been made that men want their beer and wine and that they will be dissatisfied if they do not get them. We are giving up our bread; we are surrendering food; we are eating less butter, less meat, and using less flour; we are conserving everywhere; we are working night and day to produce precious food; all over the country millions of patriotic men and women are bending their backs in honest toil to produce food, and we are asked to conserve it after it is produced. Is it asking too much when you call upon our citizens to eat less bread, to ask them also to drink less beer and less whisky, in order that we may have more food and have more efficiency in the coal mines, in the shipyards, in the navy yards, and in all the factories where men are working day and night to produce the necessary things to equip and to sustain our soldiers in their brave undertaking? Is it too much to say that the men who have their money invested in whisky and in breweries must also do their part, even though it may discommode them somewhat in a financial way?

To win this war we are willing to sacrifice in every way. Why not ask the liquor men to sacrifice some of their gains in order that the hungry may have more food, that the workman may be more efficient, that the schoolroom may be warmed instead of the brewery, and that the soldier may be better supplied with all the materials necessary to bring to our flag a brilliant and glorious victory?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] to the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD]. [Putting the question.] By the sound the noes seem to have it.

Mr. PHELAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California demands the yeas and nays. The Senator from California will please submit his amendment in writing, or, if it is not in writing, will the Senator please state it? The Secretary states that he has not a copy of the amendment.

Mr. PHELAN. I may have to state it. I find, Mr. President, some one has removed from my desk the typewritten copy of the amendment which I had.

Mr. PENROSE. It has been read, and I think it is understood by the Senate. Let us have a vote on it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from California to the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. PHELAN. I ask that it be stated; otherwise, I will state it myself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let the Senator from California state it, because the Secretary informs the Chair that he has not the amendment.

Mr. PHELAN. The amendment of the Senator from Texas provides that after June 30, 1919, there shall be no sale of beer or wine. That is in the body of the amendment. I have moved to amend by changing 1919 to 1920. That will give the wine and beer industries an opportunity to sell the existing product as of May 1, 1919, within that period. I do not think the Senate is thoroughly informed, as this is a typewritten amendment, and therefore not in the possession of all Senators, exactly what it provides. After May 1, 1919, there shall be no manufacture of wine or beer, and the Sheppard amendment provides that after the next month—that is, June 30—there shall be no sale. The wine men contend that it is impossible to sell this year's vintage—and they are cut off from any other vintage by the May 1 date—by June 30. Therefore, my motion is to extend the time for the sale of beer and wine one year, or until 1920.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from California to the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PHELAN. I now move that the time for the sale of wine alone be extended to June 30, 1920.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from California to the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, while I had the floor awhile ago I desired to read, but neglected to do so, a statement signed by the regular representatives of quite a large number of temperance agencies and organizations. I will take advantage of the present opportunity to read that statement. It is as follows:

To the United States Senate and House of Representatives:

Undersigned official representatives of temperance agencies, in view of the fuel situation and urgent need to protect new Army and conserve other war resources, protest against delay of war prohibition and urge every Senator and Representative to vote for the pending war prohibition amendment with no change, except to include the crucial period of demobilization, to which we believe the judicial opinions quoted to justify war prohibition would apply, and provision for immediate establishment of dry zones about coal mines and other industrial plants vitally related to war work.

Charles Scanlon, secretary Presbyterian Board of Temperance, secretary National Dry Federation; Virgil G. Hinshaw, chairman Prohibition National Committee; J. W. Graves, temperance secretary Baptist convention (northern); Deets Pickett, research secretary Board of Temperance, Prohibition, and Public Morals of the Methodist Episcopal Church; Wilbur F. Crafts, superintendent International Reform Bureau; D. Leigh Colvin, national president Intercollegiate Prohibition Association.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I judge from the debate that several members of the Committee on Agriculture, including the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], and possibly the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Norris], believe that wine makers should be given an opportunity to dispose of their product, and therefore, as a minimum request, which does not interfere at all with beer or with whisky, I move that the sale of wine be permitted up to and including December 31, 1919. That is an extension of six months.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California to the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PENROSE. I now submit the amendment which I have already offered and call the attention of the Senator from Texas to the phraseology which has been prepared by the Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania offers an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. In the amendment of Mr. Sheppard, in line 22, before the word "removal," it is proposed to insert the words "manufacture and sale of distilled spirits and"; also, in line 24, before the word "sale," to insert the word "manufacture."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania to the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I find, on examining the food-control act, that power was given to continue the manufacture of distilled spirits for other than beverage purposes. I therefore have no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania to the amendment of the Senator from Texas will be agreed to. The Chair hears no objection, and the amendment is agreed to.

The question now recurs on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Texas as amended.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate unduly. I feel it incumbent upon me to submit some observations regarding the substitute as explanatory of the vote which I shall cast when we reach its final consideration.

During our legislation since the war began we have had occasion to consider the subject of prohibition in connection with several war measures. It came before us on two or three occasions. We considered it in connection with the Agricultural bill of last year, in the debates upon the so-called food conservation bill, and also on the proposed constitutional amendment, which is designed to prohibit the manufacture and use of intoxicants in the United States. I think it is safe to say that but for the importance of some of these measures and the necessity of their early enactment some provisions of the law would be materially different from what they are.

I am aware, Mr. President, of the fact that no Congress can bind its successor. No Congress can place a limitation upon its own actions if it sees fit to disregard them. Hence in referring very briefly to the history of our prohibition legislation, I must not be understood as criticizing the Senate for considering the subject again. I recall, however, that the enactment of the food conservation bill, if my memory serves me right, carried an implied assurance that Congress would dispose of the general subject as speedily as possible by taking up and finally voting upon the pending prohibition amendment to the Constitution. In pursuance of that implied understanding, the measure was taken from the calendar, and, after brief discussion, it received the requisite majority, since which time the forces for and against prohibition have been active before the legislatures of the different States. I felt then, Mr. President, as I feel now, that in the adoption of that amendment Congress took or should have taken its final action upon the subject, since it gave the States full opportunity either to accept or reject the amendment and thus remove the subject from the sphere of national legislation. Yet this bill now comes before us under what is termed a war prohibition proposal, ostensibly designed to apply prohibition rigidly during the existence of the war, but actually doing nothing of the sort, thus anticipating and supplementing action upon the constitutional amendment.

Mr. President, the attitude of the advocates of this measure was consistent with that purpose when they drafted and presented the amendment as it appears in the official print of the bill. Those Senators advocating the amendment are still consistent who declare that if it is to be enacted it should take effect immediately, and not be postponed to a period so far distant that the war may be ended before it shall go into effect. But those supporting the substitute can claim no such virtue. I think the criticism of the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] upon that rather remarkable document is absolutely unanswerable. Whatever else it may be, it certainly can not be, in its present form, a war prohibition measure. It takes effect so far in the future that it is impossible to reconcile it with that contention.

I understand, Mr. President, as clearly as any other Member of this body that the substitute offered by the Senator from Texas is a compromise between opposing and conflicting views of its expediency and that each side has doubtless yielded something to the other, thus reaching a compromise which has finally found expression in the substitute. Of course, from my standpoint, the substitute is preferable to the original amendment, and for reasons which I shall very briefly state hereafter; but I do not think the country should be deceived or deluded into the notion that any law is a war measure which becomes operative nine months after its enactment. It may be a war measure. It may be that in the providence of God this terrible conflict will still be raging on the 1st of July, 1919, and possibly for years afterwards; but the exigency which should underlie any emergent war measure should be a present and not a future one, and upon the assumption that this amendment is necessary to increase the efficiency of the soldier and of the workman and of the country generally it is a contradiction in terms to enact that it shall not become effective until the 1st day of July, 1919. It would be quite as sensible and as consistent to have day before yesterday enacted a draft bill increasing the ages up and down for military liability and making it effective on the 1st day of July, 1919. We did not do so. I trust, therefore, that this measure will not be enacted upon the theory that it is one of immediate necessity or a war prohibition measure. It must stand upon some other ground.

Mr. President, I believe thoroughly in prohibition as an essential to the welfare of the country. My conversion to that doctrine has been along purely practical lines. I have become a convert to the doctrine because of the tremendous increase in industrial efficiency consequent upon the abolition of the saloon. With me it is not a matter of sentiment so much as it is a matter of necessity, because prohibition never will be and never has been the equivalent of absolute abstention. Many States of the Union have prohibition. I do not think any of them are dry, nor will they ever be until human nature and human appetites are radically altered. Yet the abolition of the saloon and the penalizing of liquor are worth so much to civilization that the accomplishment of those two great ends is a complete justification of those who insist upon its general application through the enactment of a Federal amendment.

But, Mr. President, we must take things as they are when we consider legislation of this kind, and, I think, pay due heed to certain stubborn facts, which should not be ignored or overlooked, lest we regret, and regret in the near future, legislation which from other standpoints seems to be obviously undesirable.

In the first place, Mr. President, we must acknowledge that many individuals and companies have large sums invested in the liquor traffic and in the manufacture of alcoholic beverages. That may be wrong; but society is itself responsible; society has legalized this traffic and the manufacture. It has given the assurance of the law's protection to those who are carrying on the business. You may say that society grievously erred in so doing, and I will admit it; but the fact remains that it has done so, and the pledge of protection implied in the existing law should not and can not be avoided. I never have believed in the confiscation of liquor without compensation, because I think that both a legal and a moral obligation rests upon the States of this Union and upon the Government, which have not only legalized but encouraged the traffic and the manufacture of distilled and other beverages, to make due compensation under the Constitution when the needs of society demand and require the suppression of the business. Legislation of this kind, Mr. President, if it does not provide for compensation, necessarily confiscates the property of every individual and of every company possessing, and lawfully possessing, such property when the legislation is enacted.

We have not only permitted but we have encouraged viticulture in America. The farmer has planted his vines, grown his grapes, and put them in the wine press with the encouragement and the approval of entire communities behind him. The industry has waxed strong and great and has contributed to the material wealth of the country, until now it has become so great that in one State it may be said to be a predominant pursuit. Now, I submit to the most extreme advocate of prohibition whether it be just and right, at one stroke of the legislative pen, to penalize this great industry and confiscate the visible proceeds, in the shape of growing crops, and in the fact that these crops can not be utilized except as they have been utilized in the past. This view justifies, as no other can justify, the postponement of the application of the proposed law. I do not believe in doing less. I do not hesitate to say it would be unjust. It is more than unjust, Mr. President, because while it denies the great proposition that the property of a man can not be taken from him without compensation, it at the same time decreases the material wealth of the country, now more than ever needed for purposes of taxation.

During this discussion I have heard no reference so far to that feature of the existing situation, and yet I think it is a very, very important one. The House of Representatives is now considering and endeavoring to frame a law under which eight thousand millions per annum are to be taken from the taxpayers of this country, and we are told that that is only 33⅓ per cent of the amount the Government will be called upon to expend during the next 12 months.

We are also told that the raising of this enormous sum is essential if the credit of the Nation is to be sustained and its bond issues disposed of at par. Mr. President, if that is so, the Nation needs all the money it can get all of the time. We have raised, I think, five hundred millions—I am giving the figures roughly—during the past fiscal year through our taxes upon wines, liquors, and beer. Perhaps I should include tobacco in all its forms, but even then the sum is prodigious, even in these days, when we think in billions instead of millions or hundreds of thousands. In what way, Mr. President, are we to secure revenue sufficient to supply the deficiency that will be caused by the summary abolition of this particular business? Yet if this is to be considered as a war measure at all it should take effect from and after its passage, and that would be calamitous to the National Treasury.

I grant you, Mr. President, that the prohibitionists of the country take the position, and have long occupied it, that it is wicked, immoral, and entirely indefensible to obtain revenue from such a source. If the business itself were penalized and outlawed ab initio, then I should agree to that proposition, but so long as it was not, and so long as the property itself, the article under consideration, exists and has been created by and protected under the law, just so long is it not only legitimate but creditable to the Congress that it should look to that source for a considerable part of its revenue. I think we shall have extreme difficulty in framing a measure that will produce $8,000,000,000 a year. I am not at all optimistic upon that subject, but I know, and I think every Senator within the sound of my voice knows, that if we cast aside the half billion dollars that can be raised upon and from this business it will be impossible to secure $8,000,000,000 this year or next year through the operation of a system of direct taxes, and I, for one, am not willing at this time to forego this source of revenue, which in the country's crisis becomes of the very highest importance. Why should we wipe out that source of revenue, having relied upon it, and relied upon it with much satisfaction, ever since the beginning of the War between the States?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I should like to ask the Senator if he does not think it would be quite as profitable to the Government, and less hurtful to the people, if that money were raised by an organization something like the old Louisiana Lottery?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have said that the business itself, while indefensible from any moral or industrial standpoint, has, nevertheless, been universally recognized until recent years as a lawful occupation, and under the strength and protection of the laws it has not only grown but has been encouraged. If the Louisiana Lottery had been similarly legitimatized, it would be quite as moral to collect revenue from that as from the other source. And if we had a lottery system in vogue I should hesitate to abolish it at this time, if through its continuance money could be acquired for the public expenses. We know that lotteries were resorted to in other days, in the time of Gen. Washington and afterwards, when they were regarded not only as not immoral but as very helpful to business and to progress. All these matters, Mr. President, the morality or immorality of a given business, are largely the result of progress in thought and in environment; but I should like to be told from some source where we are going to supplement this loss of revenue.

Many of my colleagues earnestly advocating the enactment of this measure have applied for, encouraged, and voted for vast appropriations from the Public Treasury for matters which, in my judgment, could well await the return of peace. I have no doubt that similar legislation will be proposed before this Congress ends. I am concerned as to where the money is coming from to meet these appropriations, to say nothing of those which are necessary for the vigorous prosecution of the war. I am not disposed now to surrender a single legitimate source of revenue, nor am I disposed to do so until peace shall have been declared and this war shall have ended. I think it is an extremely serious and vastly important feature of the discussion, and one which should be well considered before a final vote is taken upon it.

Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] called attention to a remarkable feature of this amendment. He presented it graphically, although briefly, to the consideration of the Senate, and I will refer to it briefly, because if the liquor traffic is so deadly and damnable—and I believe it is—to the people of the American Union it is equally so to the peoples of other countries.

Yet this amendment provides that we may manufacture and export this poison, this infamous commodity, to our friends and neighbors to the north and south of us and to all the countries of the world; we may profit by the appetite of others while condemning the things which minister to it as too abhorrent for use among ourselves. I can not understand that spirit of consistency and of Christian charity and of brotherly love which withholds the cup of poison from my neighbor's lips, but commends it to the weakness of the man who is not my neighbor. I believe that has been a principle in trade for many years with regard to many commodities, but never before with regard to the liquor traffic.

I can not sanction this proposal; therefore, even if I were otherwise in favor of the amendment, I could not vote for it with that provision. I would as soon think of using poison gas upon the Mexicans—and the Lord only knows what the extent of the traffic will be with them if this bill passes—or with the Canadians, or with the Republics of South America as to engage in a traffic which has been penalized and made criminal at home. I do not believe we should pass any such measure, because—to use another expression of the Senator from Pennsylvania a day or two ago—it smacks of stultification; and yet if we enact this measure and can get the ships, the traffic, and the railroad cars for transporting it to the border, we can still run our distilleries for the benefit of Mexico and South America and the British Provinces to the north of us, and do a flourishing business, and, like a Pharisee, thank God that we are not as other people.

Mr. President, there is another criticism of this amendment which I wish to offer. I call the attention of the Senate to the last proviso:

Provided, however, That nothing in this act shall be construed to interfere with the power conferred upon the President by section 15 of the food-control act, approved August 10, 1917.

The language there used is extremely broad. Indeed, I do not believe it could be made more comprehensive:

Nothing in this act shall be construed to interfere with the power conferred upon the President by section 15.

If nothing in this act shall be construed to interfere with it, then nothing in this act can diminish it, nothing in this act can affect it, nothing in this act can in any wise constrict or in any other manner influence the authority created by section 15 of the act herein referred to.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The President has no power at present with reference to sales.

Mr. THOMAS. The President may have no power with reference to sales, but that proves nothing. I have already called attention to the fact that this proviso permits sales ad libitum to people who are not so fortunate as to be citizens of this great Republic; but he has pretty nearly every other power.

Section 15 provides:

That from and after 30 days from the date of the approval of this act no foods, fruits, food materials, or feeds shall be used in the production of distilled spirits for beverage purposes: Provided, That under such rules, regulations, and bonds as the President may prescribe, such materials may be used in the production of distilled spirits exclusively for other than beverage purposes, or for the fortification of pure sweet wines as defined by the act entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," approved September 8, 1916. Nor shall there be imported into the United States any distilled spirits. Whenever the President shall find that limitation, regulation, or prohibition of the use of foods, fruits, food materials, or feeds in the production of malt or vinous liquors for beverage purposes, or that reduction of the alcoholic content of any such malt or vinous liquor, is essential, in order to assure an adequate and continuous supply of food, or that the national security and defense will be subserved thereby, he is authorized, from time to time, to prescribe and give public notice of the extent of the limitation, regulation, prohibition, or reduction so necessitated.

That is to say, the President, whether we adopt this amendment or not, may at any time, if the national food condition seems to require it, place limitations upon the percentage of foodstuffs which may be used for the manufacture of wine or of beer and afterwards change them. If no limitation is placed upon the President by this act, then after its passage he can do that same thing. He may, by an Executive order, provide that 10 or 20 or 1 per cent of all the rye produced in the country may be used in the manufacture of distilled liquors. He may declare that not more than 10 per cent or 5 per cent of the barley produced in America may be used for the making of malt. He may, in other words, assign a portion of our grain products for the manufacture of the identical things to be here prohibited; and inasmuch as the law itself is not to go into effect until the 30th day of June, 1919, then he may thereafter use that power, if he sees fit, and through its exercise a vast amount of liquor and wine and beer may be manufactured, used here and also exported, sold to the people of foreign countries. I can not believe that prohibitionists will sanction this substitute when they properly understand it:

Whenever such notice shall have been given and shall remain unrevoked no person shall, after a reasonable time prescribed in such notice, use any foods, fruits, food materials, or feeds in the production of malt or vinous liquors, or import any such liquors except under license issued by the President and in compliance with rules and regulations determined by him governing the production and importation of such liquors and the alcoholic content thereof.

Mr. President, when this section was incorporated in the food-conservation act, I think it was the practical consensus of opinion in Congress that it was wise to place the control of the manufacture of these articles in the hands of the Executive, and that we had legislated fully and amply upon the subject. If that be so, what has occurred between the date of the act from which I have quoted and the present time to require additional and yet more drastic legislation upon the same subject, and legislation which at the same time will not interfere with or in any wise affect the act of August, 1917?

I do not believe there has been as much drunkenness in the country, as much consumption of alcoholic beverages since the enactment of the food-conservation act as before. I am not aware of anything occasioning this additional measure except that the gentlemen who championed previous ones feel that present conditions justify the effort to obtain more extreme and drastic legislation.

In saying that, Mr. President, I do not reflect upon the motives of any man; but we all know that when one becomes obsessed by some particular hobby his want of perspective becomes apparent; he believes that he is a crusader, commissioned to secure the accomplishment at once of the particular thing which he desires, and that unless it is done the whole world will confront wreck and disaster.

I agree, Mr. President—there is no question about it—that the efficiency of the workman is in inverse proportion to his consumption of alcohol. That is the great moving force behind and which has caused the success in recent years of the prohibition movement. It is fundamental, and it will carry, and carry within a very short time, a sufficient number of State legislatures to make national prohibition an accomplished fact. The time, however, is desirable since men can adjust themselves to the new régime when it arrives. But, Mr. President, you can not change the nature of a man overnight. You can not legislate a man into sobriety by an act of Congress or of a State legislature. We all know that practically, unless the habit has changed very materially in recent years, the majority of men engaged in factory work in summer time, and particularly in furnaces and steel works, must have their beer. It may decrease their efficiency but they must have it, and if they do not have it there is apt to be a row. If we should enact a measure providing for absolute war prohibition to-morrow, those whose habits have been fixed perhaps through many years will not change overnight; if day after to-morrow he is deprived of what he regards as a prime necessity to his well-being he will not only be discontented but he may refuse to work at all.

Now, efficiency depends primarily upon the proposition that work in some degree must be done, and in the present disturbed condition of labor I will not vote for immediate or future legislation which will radically interfere with the habits and the settled practice of a very large number of laborers at this time engaged in war work, thus sowing discontent and affording fresh and dangerous incentives to resentment and trouble.

Their interest, Mr. President, is the basis of the attitude of the American Federation of Labor upon this subject, and, I think, it is a sound one. I believe that if immediate prohibition should be enacted it will decrease the efficiency of our war industries. The one merit of the substitute is that it does not do this. That is not enough or should not be enough to save it. By continuing the present law it defeats itself by legalizing the export of liquor to other countries, it stultifies the cause of prohibition, and by postponing its operation for nine months it ceases to be a war measure.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I find myself unable to vote for this amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I am not going to make a speech, but in connection with the question of efficiency I desire to have the Secretary read a letter that I received from the executive secretary of the Portland Chamber of Commerce on this subject. I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that in the Northwest a great many ships are being built for the Emergency Fleet Corporation and in Portland a number are being built.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

PORTLAND CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Portland, Oreg., August 19, 1918.

HONS. GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN, C. L. MCNARY, WILLIS C. HAWLEY, N. J. SINNOTT, C. N. MCARTHUR, Oregon Delegation, Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: In view of the fight being made by certain interests to maintain the privilege of manufacturing alcoholic beverages in this country during the war, the chamber of commerce takes this opportunity of presenting to the members of its delegation what seems apparent to business men the result of prohibition on industrial conditions of Oregon.

Employers of labor are quite uniform in the view that the absence of alcoholic beverages from the State adds very greatly to the efficiency of the men engaged in shipbuilding and all other war industries in Oregon. Instead of alcoholic beverages being an advantage, it is quite generally conceded by those who have had opportunity to profit by its absence that it is a disadvantage in the labor problem and a handicap of such moment that the country should act without delay in removing it in this time of stress if not forever.

This organization submits that the record in shipbuilding work here may be taken with safety by the shipbuilders of the East as proof of the benefits that will come from making the Nation dry during the period of the war.

Respectfully,

W. D. B. DODSON,
Executive Secretary.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, the letter which the Senator from Oregon has just had read by the clerk expresses more strongly my own views than I could express them myself. Prohibition is not an experiment but a demonstrative success. It has never been tried anywhere in the world and proven a failure. I am therefore for prohibition whether it be war prohibition or peace prohibition. I am for prohibition because I believe it is good for mankind. It stimulates the mind, preserves the morals, and strengthens the physical man in all the walks of life. It is the greatest conservation measure that ever engaged the attention of a legislative body.

If I were called upon at this time to name the one thing that has wrought the most harm in the world, blighted more lives, frustrated more ambitions, caused more scalding tears to fall from the eyes of woman, I should say the excessive use of intoxicating liquors. It has filled the jails with criminals, the asylums with idiots and lunatics, and the poorhouses with human derelicts. It is an evil without a mitigating incident and it seems to me that the man who refuses when he has an opportunity to remove this evil from mankind and fails to do it is an enemy to humanity.

Mr. President, it is my judgment that the pending amendment involves an unfortunate surrender to the liquor interests of America. I can not for the life of me follow the processes which lead Senators to the conclusion that it is right to postpone prohibition until next June. Of course, I would rather have prohibition next June than not to have it at all, but if prohibition will strengthen our forces, help to win the war, work for the efficiency of the men laboring in the munition plants and elsewhere after June, 1919, why in the name of God should we postpone its benign effects for a year? We need the good effects that will come from prohibition right now more than any other time.

It seems to me that the question presented is whether the Congress shall do the thing needful to win the war and save humanity from the evil effects of drink or permit the nefarious traffic to go on and thereby promote the pecuniary welfare of the brewers. That is the issue presented by this amendment as I see it. I have no enmity toward the brewers, I have no desire that by my vote anybody shall lose money, but when it comes to serving my country, preserving the morals of our people, and saving them from the disastrous effect of excessive drink, the pecuniary losses which a few men may sustain become of inconsequential concern to me. I do not believe it is the purpose of the influence that inspired and dictated the pending amendment to have war prohibition at all. This amendment, it is well known, did not find its origin and inspiration in the Senate. It came from a coordinate branch of the Government. Of course, the Congress, uninfluenced, is not going to vote for this measure in order to promote the interest of the brewers, but since the matter of money and profits has been suggested I am going to ask permission to have read a letter from Dr. Dinwiddie, dated August 23, 1918, in which will be found some figures in an article entitled "Beer or bandages," by Mark R. Shaw.

I take it that the figures presented in this communication are true, or Dr. Dinwiddie would not have sent them to me. People talk about raising money to meet the expenses of the war. The article by Mr. Shaw points out how a large amount of it might be raised without impoverishing the citizen. If the citizen would devote the money which he spends for booze to buying bonds, the money necessary to conduct the war would be furnished and the man who furnished it would be better off than if he had spent the money for liquor.

It is not my desire to delay the Senate at this time. A tired look, due to the long, hot session, which I see on the faces of my colleagues admonishes me that they vant to vote on the bill, but I desire to say in conclusion, Mr. President, that I am disappointed in the action of the Committee on Agriculture.

I am not surprised, because I understood that the amendment was being prepared and was going to be adopted. The order had gone forth that the manufacture of beer should not be interfered with for another year. I wish I were able to defeat the measure. But I can not; therefore I reluctantly yield to the unfortunate situation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection leave will be granted to publish the letter referred to.

The letter referred to is as follows:

BEER OR BANDAGES?

(By Mark R. Shaw.)

Uncle Samuel has asked the Nation to invest $2,000,000,000 in War Savings Stamps during 1918. According to the latest available figures our drink bill for a year is over $2,400,000,000.

During the last Liberty Loan drive I picked up a circular entitled, "Turn the Key on Kaiserism—Invest in Liberty Bonds," telling what Liberty Bonds of various sizes would purchase for the boys over there. Using these figures it is interesting to see what we could do with the money that we pass over the bar for booze every day while the boys are in France.

Our drink bill for one day would pay for any one of the following items, and for a week it would buy all of them! Did you think of this during War Savings Stamp Week?

1. Buy a $5 pair of shoes for each of 1,300,000 men.
2. Purchase gas masks for 253,000 men, at $27 each.
3. Clothe and feed 22,830 soldiers in France for an entire year, at $500 each.
4. Furnish 6,850 motor rolling kitchens, at $1,000 each.
5. Buy 4,566 motor ambulances, at $1,500 each.
6. Construct 137 base hospitals with 500 beds each, at a cost of $50,000 per hospital.
7. Fully equip 2,055 hospital wards with 50 beds each, with beds made up and linen in reserve, chairs, tables, mirrors, foot tubs, 120 pairs of pajamas, bath robes, and towels, at $3,350 per ward.

Shall we be more tender with the profits of the German brewers than with the lives of our sons?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I desire to present to the Senate various petitions asking for war prohibition which I have received signed by some thousands of my constituents.

Mr. President, I wish to say that while this substitute does not suit the extremes of either side, yet considering the fact that those who believe in prohibition have been attempting for years and years to get such a measure through Congress, considering that ever since war was declared we have been trying to get measures passed that would produce war prohibition, considering the fact that very little progress has been made in that direction, considering that this is not an independent bill which is presented to the Senate, but is a measure tacked on as an amendment to an Agricultural appropriation bill, you can see why it was that the prohibitionists of this body who had the matter under consideration were willing to fix May 1 as the date when manufacturing of liquor must cease and June 30, 1919, as the date upon which all sales shall end. If the Congress of the United States when war was first declared had enacted immediate prohibition as a war measure and offered to commandeer and pay for all the liquor and use it in the manufacture of explosives, which I was in favor of doing, it would have cost less than the loss which this Government has sustained by reason of inefficiency from the use of intoxicating liquors by its citizens and its workmen.

These Senators, consisting of most of the prohibitionists of this body who have been attempting to get through this measure, have met with Senators who are opposed absolutely to abolishing the use of intoxicating liquors. They have met with some people who want to have prohibition declared immediately. They have met with some people who say they will oppose to the bitter end the passage of a law that would immediately produce prohibition, even if the Government would commandeer all of the liquor.

Mr. President, there comes in the consideration of all legislation matters of give and take. The Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] is well known to have been one of the strongest advocates of prohibition. He is the author of the constitutional amendment proposing Nation-wide prohibition. I know he found that this compromise contains the very best terms he could get. I know the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] has been a most ardent advocate of prohibition, and I know that he would not have consented to this compromise if he had thought that he could get better terms as to when the act should take effect, and the same is true as to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and other Members who have spoken. They preferred to take these terms than run the risk of losing the entire measure by delays and filibustering. This measure has been delayed for months and months.

Is it possible that we want to kill this measure because the time for it to take effect is not quite soon enough to suit us? Do we want to do that in view of conditions I have described and in view of the fact that we could never have gotten through an independent bill, perhaps, at all or at least as rapidly as this will be put through? We know that according to the rules of the Senate much delay must happen in the consideration of a bill that is obnoxious even to a few Members. You know and I know that if it is opposed bitterly any half dozen Senators can defeat a bill by filibustering when much important legislation is pending before the Senate.

In view of that condition, what were these men to do who had the best interests of their cause at heart? It unquestionably was to form some kind of an agreement as near to their view as they possibly could. When they have done that the Senate of the United States ought to sustain them.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I desire to say just a word with reference to the proviso in the pending substitute authorizing the President of the United States to establish zones around munition plants, shipyards, and other plants engaged in war work, in which the sale of intoxicating liquors shall be prohibited. I am glad there is no opposition to this provision here, and I sincerely hope that the Senate conferees will insist upon retaining this provision of the bill when the bill gets into conference.

My only reason for taking any time now at this late hour is to give to the Senate an illustration in my own State of the necessity of the provision.

Both the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota have local option. The cities of Superior, Wis., and Duluth, Minn., adjoin each other. Duluth has a population of about 85,000, Superior of about 50,000. In these two cities there are four shipyards, employing upward of 5,000 men. There is one steel plant engaged wholly in munition work, employing upward of 4,000 men. Both these cities are dry. Saloons have been prohibited. All the territory in the immediate vicinity of these cities is dry with the exception of one village in the State of Wisconsin, in which there were cast last April 31 votes, and which voted for saloons. This little village is located one mile and a half from the steel plant engaged in making munitions of war and in which, as I have said, there are employed upward of 4,000 men. A little farther away there is a shipyard employing, I am informed, upward of 1,500 men.

We therefore have a condition at the head of Lake Superior at this time where in this one little place there is one saloon, for under the laws of Wisconsin there can be only one saloon for every 250 inhabitants, and there are seven alleged wholesale liquor houses.

I visited this place about three weeks ago. I found that the one saloon was a very large building, jammed to the door, with 8 or 10 bartenders, with men struggling to the bar to get a drink, and several busses running from the steel plant to the village and the saloon. The seven wholesale liquor houses were not permitted to engage in business as a saloon, but regarding it as a wholesale liquor business were selling beer in pint bottles and whisky in half-pint bottles. That is a condition that we have within a very short distance of plants engaged in war work employing several thousand men.

There is no way, I am afraid, under the law of the State or under existing Federal law by which this alleged condition can be remedied. It can be remedied and will be remedied if this provision is retained in the bill.

I am informed that the officials of the steel plant engaged in munition work and the officials of the shipyard have written letters stating that the existence of these saloons in this near proximity to the plant is a very great injury to war work. I know that the officials of both Superior and Duluth have been making every effort and doing everything within their power to secure the abolition of the saloon in this place. There is, I am afraid, at present no way by which it can be done, except through the operation of this provision, and therefore I most strongly hope that the provision will be retained in the law, which, after all, only gives to the President the discretion to establish these zones in such places as he may deem the necessities of the war shall justify.

That is all I have to say, Mr. President, except that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] a few minutes ago handed me a letter written to him by a public official of the city of Duluth detailing somewhat more in detail the condition as I have described it. I will not read the letter, but I will ask that it be inserted in the RECORD in connection with my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, leave will be granted. The Chair hears no objection.

The letter is as follows:

DULUTH, MINN., July 22, 1918.

Hon. KNUTE NELSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. NELSON: In the interest of the general public and its industries, especially the steel plant and the shipbuilding plant, I am taking the liberty of writing you in order to make you acquainted with the evil we have to contend with, the township of Oliver, in Wisconsin.

As you well know, Duluth went dry a year ago this month and I can not tell you how well pleased we were, and how clean our city has been ever since. Our trouble then started when Superior would go dry, and thank the Lord it did go dry on July 1, 1918.

Then comes one or two liquor dealers and organized the township of Oliver, in Wisconsin, and got a few voters in there in order to vote for the license and defy the State of Wisconsin, as well as the State of Minnesota, in giving licenses to one retail liquor dealer and seven wholesale houses. These seven wholesale liquor houses do in reality a retail business, for they sell from 1 pint to a gallon of liquor. As the laws in Wisconsin are somewhat different from ours in Minnesota, a wholesale dealer can not sell any amount. In Minnesota a wholesale dealer can not sell any less than 5 gallons.

Oliver is situated right across the bridge leading from New Duluth, and while we have officers stationed everywhere we have not enough to watch the bridge and the river, as they go by small boats across, directly opposite the steel plant and the shipbuilding plant. I have been over to Oliver several times with our chief of police and with the chief of the fire department, as well as with other gentlemen, and I tell you, Mr. NELSON, if there ever has been any injustice to humanity or crime against the industries and our Government and the sin that we allow young men to go over to be debauched by liquor, it is this Oliver. The last time I was there, which was last Friday, I found there were no less than 100 young men in the barrooms and the wholesale liquor houses sousing themselves up. Men that ought to be doing something. If they did not have the opportunity of getting liquor, they certainly would be doing something. I would suggest that some Government official take one look at the situation, and there is no doubt in my mind that he would not wait until he got back to Washington, but he would immediately recommend the closing of all saloons and liquor houses at once. For the welfare and benefit of humanity and for our Government, which needs every able-bodied man for some work, something should be done. If those saloons were in our State, our safety commission would have full power to abolish them, but the Wisconsin commission does not seem to have that power. Senator LENROOT, I understand, is at the present time in Superior, and I will take him over to Oliver to see the conditions.

One thing more: I have just learned that the whisky sold at Oliver is of such an inferior grade that about two drinks will almost put a man to sleep.

I hope, my dear NELSON, that you will take this up at once, as it is of the utmost importance, not only to the general public but to the steel plant and the shipbuilding plant as well, as one can not tell what rowdies may do when they are intoxicated. I am writing a similar letter to Congressman MILLER.

Thanking you in advance for anything you might do to have the Oliver saloons closed, I am,

Very truly, yours, B. SILBERSTEIN.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the substitute. Wherever the date fixes the time for the operation of the law I move to substitute January 1, 1919. I offer that amendment at the proper places.

Mr. VARDAMAN. As there will probably be no roll call on it, I desire to express most heartily my concurrence in the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. There are four places in the amendment where the date "June 30, 1919," occurs, and one place where the date "May 1, 1919," occurs. It is proposed to change the date from June 30, 1919, to January 1, 1919, in every instance where it occurs.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I merely wish to suggest that that would make it substantially what this is offered as a substitute for, but it does not make any difference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] to the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD].

Mr. PHELAN. What is the amendment, Mr. President? Please have the amendment stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. Where the date June 30, 1919, occurs in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas it is proposed to insert January 1, 1919.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I do not propose to make a speech on behalf of this amendment to the amendment. I fully appreciate the fact that there is a desire on the part of the Senate to take a vote on and to complete the consideration of this measure this afternoon. The amendment to the amendment embraces my idea as to the date upon which this provision should go into operation, and I have offered the amendment to the amendment as expressive of my views upon the subject. I do not propose to enter into any discussion at all.

I believe in war-time prohibition. I think the conditions in our country justify it and make it a wise policy upon the part of Congress to adopt a measure along these lines. I think it should not be delayed longer than January 1, 1919, and that is my object in offering the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Florida to the amendment of the Senator from Texas.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs upon the amendment of the Senator from Texas as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is upon agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

The amendment of the committee as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised that several amendments to the bill have been passed over. The Secretary will report such amendments in their order.

The SECRETARY. The first amendment in the bill passed over is the first amendment of the committee, on page 2, line 2, where the committee proposes to strike from the House text the proviso beginning in line 4 and continuing down to and including line 18.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. ASHURST and others. Oh, no!

Mr. GORE. I understand that there is a desire to have an executive session, and so I withdraw my motion.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, it is necessary to have an executive session as there are a number of nominations to be acted upon.

Mr. GORE. I have withdrawn my motion to adjourn, I will say to the Senator, in view of the desire to have an executive session, and stated that I would not make the motion at this time.

Mr. MARTIN. I did not hear the Senator, and I beg his pardon. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, August 30, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, August 29, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. KITCHIN).

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer.

Our Father in Heaven, help us to a susceptible mood and make us tractable to that spirit which is ever going forth from Thy heart; that we may clearly comprehend our duty to Thee and our fellow men; and be quick to apprehend the right and strong to resist the evil; that we may render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's and unto Thee, our God, the things that are Thine; and pursue our way rejoicing in a clear conscience; in His name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by incorporating in the RECORD an address delivered by the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Uruguay, Dr. Brum, at a banquet given in honor of the Secretary of State, Hon. Robert Lansing, night before last, and Mr. Lansing's reply. They are strong Pan American addresses and I believe will render good effect in drawing the Americas closer together.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the purpose of having it in the RECORD of Congress? It is a diplomatic affair.

Mr. FLOOD. Well, my idea was that it went more fully into the relations between the different Americas, and it is one of the most formal addresses delivered by Dr. Brum during his visit to this country and I thought it would be well to put it into the RECORD.

Mr. WALSH. That is the gentleman who made the address the other day?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

APPROPRIATIONS—DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 323) making appropriations for certain necessary operations of the Government and of the District of Columbia for the month of September, 1918, and for other purposes.

Resolved, etc., That the provisions of the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution making appropriations for certain necessary operations of the Government and of the District of Columbia for the months of July and August, 1918, and for other purposes," approved July 8, 1918, except so far as they relate to the support of the Army, are extended and continued in full force and effect for and during the month of September, 1918.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman allow me perhaps five minutes to state some general objections? And perhaps he can answer them so that I will withdraw them.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I took occasion, I remember, at the end of the first Congress, some six years ago, that the Democratic Party controlled to criticize the habit of passing these continuing resolutions, and I then set forth at considerable detail the embarrassment that it is to the Government not to pass the appropriation bills before the 1st of July. I do not wish to go back and repeat the argument which I then enunciated contrasting the policy of the Democratic Party in not passing appropriation bills on time with the promptness of the Republican Party, though I still feel, as I did then, that it is extremely important that these appropriation bills should pass during the fiscal year, and it is extremely harmful to the public interests to continue this practice of continuing last year's appropriations for this year. Now, we have already, through the months of July and August, been running the government of the District of Columbia and have been running the Government appropriations for the Agricultural Department on last year's basis, so that improvements which the bills of this year projected have not been utilized. It has caused both of those departments great inconvenience, and it has undoubtedly caused the Government great expense. Now, I think it is time that both of those bills should be agreed to in some way. I do not know so much about the Agricultural bill; I do not know why that has not been agreed to. I do know more about the District appropriation bill, and I think that ought to have been agreed to before this, and I think that now, to bring this in just before the 1st of September, when there is no time for the House deliberately to pass this bill, is not the right kind of administration. I do not know what efforts the conferees on the District of Columbia bill have made to agree. I understand they have not even met for several weeks. I do not know what efforts the conferees on the Agricultural bill have made to agree; but before this House passes this continuing resolution, I think it should be informed in detail and specifically why it is at this very late day we are asked to do this, and why it is that the conferees before this have not made an agreement. Therefore, until I am enlightened on these phases and until some reason is given why an agreement has not been made and why this resolution has not been brought in earlier, because it is embarrassing to have it brought here so close to the 1st of September—Sunday—as, of course, it produces great pressure on the House to bring in the resolution now, when you can say that unless we do something there will be no appropriation at all in force and the Government must stop. Consequently I think that until these facts are explained to the House so that we are satisfied that this resolution is the only available method to meet the emergency I shall object.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I wish to state to the gentleman from Massachusetts that I am sure no criticism can be attached to either the House or the Senate on account of these bills not having been passed prior to July 1. As a matter of fact, both of these bills did pass, according to my recollection, both bodies prior to July 1. They were then thrown in conference. The gentleman is familiar with the fact that there has been a difference between the conferees upon the District bill. If I mistake not the conferees have reported back a disagreement at least twice and the House has had a vote upon it, and the matter is still in conference. So far as the Agricultural bill is concerned the gentleman will recall that it went to the Senate and that the Senate adopted an amendment providing for $2.50 wheat; that it came back to the House, and the House and Senate finally agreed to an amendment providing for $2.40 wheat, and thereupon the bill was sent to the President and received his veto just shortly before Congress took its recess. There was not sufficient time then to present a bill eliminating the feature that was objectionable to the President and pass it before the recess was taken.

Mr. GILLETT. Does the gentleman know what efforts have been made during the last month on the Agricultural bill?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There has been no effort, because, as a matter of fact, the bill that was passed by Congress was vetoed, and it will be necessary to pass an entirely new appropriation bill. And, as I say, there was no opportunity for the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture to present that bill in time for its passage before the recess was taken. Knowing the chairman of the Agricultural Committee, as I do, I am quite sure that he will present a bill to the House at the earliest possible moment, and that it will be very quickly passed and become a law.

The gentleman from Massachusetts offers some criticism because this resolution was not introduced at an earlier date. The gentleman knows it is always the custom to withhold these continuing resolutions until about the time it becomes necessary to pass them, in order to afford opportunity to the two Houses to get together on pending bills if possible. And, of course, I had no knowledge as to whether or not the conferees would get together and agree and present a report which would save the necessity of passing this resolution. I am offering it to-day. I could have withheld it until Saturday, possibly, but I feared the Senate might possibly take a recess over until Monday, and if this resolution does not become a law between now and the 1st of the month it is going to interfere seriously with the operations and work of the Agricultural Department and the District of Columbia Government. In fact, there will be no money available for either.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield to me 10 minutes?

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] has objected.

Mr. GILLETT. I reserved my objection.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I am not so much interested in the request so far as it affects the Agricultural bill as I am in the District of Columbia appropriation bill, and for this reason: A continuing resolution would give the Agricultural Department practically all it would have under the new law, and hence I can see no substantial objection to that, except there can be no substantial reason for the unreasonable delay. But that is not the case so far as the District of Columbia is concerned. We have in this year's appropriation increased the salaries of 2,103 employees, including 1,057 teachers in our schools. The salary paid to the teachers of the public schools in Washington is a national disgrace, and under this continuing resolution those teachers will be compelled to continue to teach, if they come back and accept their positions, at the old pay. This continuing resolution does not give them a penny of the $127,000 increased pay given them by this bill. Why, take the salaries of the teachers in class 3, and there are 408 of them, each receiving a salary of $650 a year. We increased their salaries only $100 a year, and now we would deny them the right of that increase for one-fourth of the year. We had 352 teachers in class 2, who have salaries of $600 a year, and if this continuing resolution is agreed to these teachers will be asked to come back here within two weeks and commence work at the old pay of $600 a year, when we are bringing in girls here from all over the country and paying them a minimum salary of $1,000 a year in the departments. Pass this resolution, and what will become of the schools of Washington?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If this continuing resolution is not adopted here, there will not be any salaries to pay any teachers.

Mr. GOOD. Yes; there will be. If this continuing resolution is not adopted, this House has sense enough and judgment enough and patriotism enough to recede on that provision which would amend the half-and-half law of the District, then pass the appropriation bill, and give to these teachers the increase that Congress intended they should have. That is what will happen.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I yield for a question.

Mr. TOWNER. Would it not be infinitely better at this time to waive that action of the House regarding the half-and-half provision until, at least, this war is over?

Mr. GOOD. Absolutely. At any rate, here is an appropriation bill with legislation enacted on it, and it is the duty of the body offering that legislation to yield rather than to let a great appropriation bill fail.

I want to call the attention of the House to another thing. The situation in the District is altogether abnormal. Last year we appropriated $3,000 for portable schools, because even then large numbers of children were being brought to the District by their parents who come here to do war work, and the present school buildings were not adequate. What does this bill carry for portable schools? This bill carries $231,000 for portable schools, and it was so necessary to have them that the chairman of the committee brought in the bill which passed the House making that money immediately available upon the passage of the bill. And now, if we adopt this resolution, how much can they get for these portable schools? Not a single dollar. The money was necessary last May, and here we are approaching the 1st of September with schools convening and thousands of children in the District of Columbia will be denied the privilege of that common school education that every man, every patriotic citizen, wants them to have. Under this continuing resolution there can be nothing done to increase the school equipment.

We are bringing in to-day, I am told, soldiers from the cantonments near Washington to take the place of policemen in the District in order to police the District, because we can not get police officers at the low pay. We provided for an increase in their pay, and these men are not going to accept positions while the House and the Senate are buffeting about the ball of responsibility.

If the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] does not make a point of order, I shall, and if the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON], the chairman of the committee, having charge of this bill, does not move that the House recede from its action to adhere and agree to Senate amendment No. 1 and involving the half-and-half proposition, I shall take the responsibility of doing what I can along that line myself [applause], because the time has come when Congress must act. Business judgment requires that it should act. Every consideration that moves a Member of Congress requires that we get down to business, both Houses, and pass the appropriations for the District of Columbia and the Department of Agriculture.

I am told that the great purchasing departments of the District, accustomed to buying in large quantities, so as to take advantage of favorable prices, have been hampered by these continuing resolutions, which prevent the purchasing officers from going into the market and buying more than one-twelfth of the supplies. This bill ought to have been a law on the 1st day of July at least, and the funds necessary to administer the District made available at that time, and now we are approaching the 1st day of September, and I undertake to say to the gentleman from Tennessee, whose desire in this matter is to be commended I am sure, that I place none of the blame or the responsibility upon him, yet Congress and the District find themselves in the same condition they were in 60 days ago. That condition must not continue to exist. September 1 will be here in a few days, and the conferees will be no nearer together than they were when we passed the former continuing resolution, and when October 1 comes we shall be confronted by the same condition that confronts us now, and the sensible thing for this House to do is to recede from its former action in its decision to adhere, and yield to Senate amendment No. 1. None of that increase for improvements on streets and roads can be obtained by a continuing resolution.

I might proceed further and give instance after instance how the growth of this city has required increased appropriations for the District of Columbia, and by our unwise action we are denying here in Washington, the seat of the Nation's Government, money that is actually necessary to conduct the schools and the business of the District in a business-like and legitimate way. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Should objection be made to unanimous consent to the resolution that has been offered, will it be in order, Mr. Speaker, to make a motion that the House rescind its action instructing the conferees to insist upon the so-called half-and-half amendment, and move to disagree to the Senate amendments and agree to a conference?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair that could not be done. That question is not up under the resolution.

Mr. MONDELL. Would such a motion be in order if objection were made?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not in order at this time under any circumstances. The question of unanimous consent is before us.

Mr. MONDELL. There is no object to be gained in passing continuing resolutions affecting the District of Columbia bill. By so doing we are simply continuing an intolerable condition. I am informed—and I think reliably informed—that until the House rescinds its action touching the half-and-half plan, instructing its conferees, the Senate conferees will not confer with the House conferees, and there is no possibility of securing an agreement on the bill. There is a deadlock, but it can be broken instantly by the action of the House, and when broken, if the House recedes from its insistence on its half-and-half amendment, I think there is no sort of question but that an agreement can be immediately reached. There is no good reason why such a motion should not be made. The Chair can recognize the gentleman in charge of the bill to make it, and if it is made this entire matter can be quickly settled. The conference report can be agreed upon to-day and the District bill can become a law to-morrow.

Mr. GILLETT. It is probably true, of course, as the Speaker has said, that that is not before us at this moment, but I understand the papers of the conference report are before the House, and the chairman of the House conferees could bring them up this minute if he wished to.

Mr. MONDELL. Surely.

Mr. GILLETT. And the House could vote, if it wished to, to agree.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; and that is the only way in which this matter can be settled, either now or later. I think the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] in charge of this bill understands and knows that to be a fact.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, let me state this to the gentleman. This is a condition that confronts the House, and it must be settled one way or other between now and the 1st of September. If the bills are not passed before September 1, and there seems to be little or no likelihood of that being done, then this continuing resolution must be passed between now and the 1st of September, or there is going to be a most serious situation and really a stopping of the wheels of activity in the Department of Agriculture as well as in the government of the District of Columbia. For instance, not only here in the city of Washington, in the departments, but in all the activities of the Department of Agriculture throughout the country, in the gentleman's own State, in my State, and in every other State of this Union, the department will be without money to pay those in its employ. The Department of Agriculture is performing a very great and very necessary and very essential service in the conduct of this war by increasing production, and so forth.

Now, if the gentleman or any other gentleman desires to take the responsibility of absolutely disarranging and throwing into confusion the great work that is now being done in the Department of Agriculture and actually stopping the nation-wide activities of that department by objecting to a continuing resolution, which simply provides that the appropriations heretofore made shall be in force and effect for the next month, of course, he can take that responsibility.

Now, coming to the District of Columbia bill, let me say this to the gentleman: That matter is now in conference. The House is represented on that conference committee, and——

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Is the gentleman entirely accurate in his statement that that matter is now in conference?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is in conference.

Mr. MONDELL. Are the conferees meeting? Have the conferees met recently? Does not the gentleman know, as a matter of fact, that the Senate conferees have declined to meet the House conferees, in view of the action of the House?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not.

Mr. MONDELL. And they insist on a full and free conference on this bill.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think not.

Mr. MONDELL. I so understand it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That matter is now in conference between the two Houses. I have enough confidence in the conferees on the part of the House to believe that when they meet the Senate conferees they will not delay the matter, but will immediately report that bill back in disagreement, if they can not agree, and then the House will have full and ample opportunity either to recede or take such action as the majority wishes. But I submit in all fairness that it is not, if the gentleman will pardon me, wise or good judgment to undertake to interpose here the local question of the half-and-half proposition in opposition to a resolution which seeks only to continue the activities of the Department of Agriculture and the activities of the District of Columbia during the next month, pending the consideration of these two bills.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman has had notice served on him that there will be objection to his resolution in its present form; but the gentleman will have no difficulty at all in drafting a resolution that will continue the Agricultural appropriations, and I assume that there would be no objection to such a resolution. But it is clear from the statements that have already been made that gentlemen will disagree to that feature of the resolution which affects the District of Columbia appropriations, and they are fully justified in objecting. The House has insisted upon new legislation on an appropriation bill, and the House has further instructed its conferees to adhere thereto, and my understanding is that under those circumstances the Senate conferees refuse to confer on the subject. Now the entire matter can be settled in a moment, so far as the District of Columbia appropriations are concerned, by a motion receding from the action of the House in instructing its conferees to adhere, and by agreeing to a full and free conference on all questions in controversy on the District appropriation bill. If that is done, that bill can become a law to-morrow, the school-teachers will receive their salaries, the absolutely essential temporary schoolhouses can be erected, the streets of this District, which are a disgrace to the Nation, can be repaired, and District business go on in an orderly way. The House should rescind its action in view of the justifiable insistence of the Senate that they will not agree to important legislation on an appropriation bill. There is a reasonable, logical, proper, effective way to meet this matter and meet it at once, and gentlemen are justified in their opposition to a continuing resolution which at best will carry on the District government in a halting, ineffectual, entirely unsatisfactory way.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I am not in charge of the District of Columbia appropriation bill, and of course under those circumstances will not make any motion with reference to it; but the attitude of the gentleman seems to be that notwithstanding the action of the majority of the House taken heretofore, and to which, I take it, the conferees on the part of the House are adhering as it is their duty to do, the gentleman, because he differs with the majority of the House upon the proposition of the half and half, proposes to interpose an objection to this resolution in order to force the majority of the House to take a position different from that which they have heretofore taken. That is the effect of his position if the gentleman objects to this resolution.

Mr. MONDELL. The impasse is due to the resolution instructing the House conferees, and its effect upon the Senate conferees.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow a suggestion?

Mr. SIMS. As this matter is proceeding under a request for unanimous consent, I shall have to ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee demands the regular order.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman withdraw his demand for a moment?

Mr. SIMS. I withdraw it to allow the gentleman from Illinois to make a statement.

Mr. CANNON. Personally I am not objecting to the consideration of the gentleman's resolution; but objection will be made, as several gentlemen have stated, to the consideration of the resolution in its present form. Now, if that is the case, why not let the District matter go over for the present and introduce a resolution covering the Agricultural Department only, to which evidently there would be no objection. I suggest to the gentleman, if objection is made, that he modify his resolution so as to take care of the Agricultural Department for the coming month.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman in reply that the same reason exists for the passage of a continuing resolution for the District of Columbia that exists for the passage of a continuing resolution for the Agricultural Department.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Now, as I pointed out a moment ago, the House has its remedy, and if, as several gentlemen have stated, the only trouble about passing the District of Columbia appropriation bill is the half-and-half proposition, the House can easily take care of that and do it at any time that it desires to do so. I take it that the conferees will make some sort of a report within the next few days. I am quite sure that they will, and when that report comes in, if the House desires to recede, it can do so; but I submit that we ought to take no chances of absolutely depriving the District of money during the next month on a contingency such as the gentleman refers to.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me, in parliamentary usage when the House agrees to adhere the bill fails unless the Senate recedes. If it be true—I have no knowledge about it—that the Senate, for the reason that this involves legislation, declines to meet the House conferees, therefore the bill fails. Now, I simply suggest that we do care for the Agricultural Department, and I trust that during the day, or before the 1st of September, action may be had touching the District.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, there is some misconception on the part of the gentlemen who have been discussing this matter as to the real parliamentary status. When the House made its motion to adhere to its disagreement to the three matters now in difference, the bill went back to the Senate, and the Senate, evidently under a misconception of the facts, simply insisted upon their further disagreement with the House as to those amendments and asked for a conference. When the House adhered to its disagreement, no conferees were appointed, of course; but when the bill got to the Senate and the Senate then insisted upon their disagreement with the House and appointed conferees and asked for a conference, as a matter of courtesy we agreed to the conference. We could not tell what proposition the Senate might make, and of course agreed to a conference. I take it that but for the change in the personnel of the conferees this matter might have been settled. I do not know that that is true, but I take it that it could have been.

Mr. GILLETT. I do not understand the gentleman. Does he mean that no conferees have been appointed by the House?

Mr. SISSON. They have been appointed.

Mr. GILLETT. I misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. SISSON. I stated that after we had adhered, when the motion was made in the Senate to further insist upon its amendments, conferees on the part of the Senate were appointed, and the papers were sent back to the House. Then we agreed to the conference asked for by the Senate, as a matter of courtesy, believing that they, having asked for a conference, knew the parliamentary status in the House, and that they want to make some proposition different from the proposition that we had disagreed to. They might have made a proposition which the House as a compromise could and perhaps would have accepted. Therefore the House appointed conferees under the impression that the Senate knew what they were doing. I take it that the House did not want to put itself in the attitude of declining, as a matter of courtesy, to see what proposition the Senate had to make. Of course, the House conferees had no proposition that they could make except in an informal way, because they had been instructed to adhere.

Now, there is this peculiar situation in reference to this whole matter: Certain Members of the House are now criticizing the House itself for legislating on an appropriation bill when one of the items in disagreement is an item in which the Senate are insisting upon legislation, so that they can not blow hot and blow cold upon that proposition.

Mr. MONDELL. It is to be assumed that the House conferees do not agree.

Mr. SISSON. We have not agreed, I will say to my friend. Now, let us get down to the real situation. We are not going to agree to the McKellar amendment. There is no justification for it. It has been knocking about the corridors almost ever since I have been in Congress. The House has never had a single Member that agreed to it. The District authorities tell us that it will involve us in endless controversy about many of these matters where property has been condemned and adjustments have been made. So, gentlemen of the House, we can not agree to it nor will the House agree to it. But the conferees on the part of the Senate insist that we shall accept that or there will be no agreement.

To come to the real point of difference between the House and the Senate, as to the fiscal policy of the Government in the future in dealing with the District of Columbia, I do not care what position you may take to-day, this proposition is going to be before every Congress from now until this half-and-half proposition is settled and settled right.

I have stated to the Senate conferees in fairness to the House conferees that if they would state in the RECORD the reasons why they believed that the half-and-half principle ought to be maintained, that I would make a statement to the House and not make a further statement about it and let the House act on it one way or the other. That was before we made the motion to adhere. They declined to give any further reason. I then stated that if they would give me one reason upon which they were willing to stand and go before the country and say for that reason we must insist that the half and half ought to be maintained, I would make that statement to the House. They declined to make the statement and said they had no statement to make.

I do not believe that any man can investigate the fiscal relations between the District of Columbia and the Federal Government and come to any other conclusion than that the half-and-half principle is wrong. This fundamental principle may be laid down and then every man can stand on it. The property of the District of Columbia should be assessed at a fair valuation, and upon that fair valuation should be assessed a reasonable tax rate, and the people of the District of Columbia should pay that reasonable rate upon a reasonable assessment.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman will yield, in the event that this resolution is adopted, I want to ask the gentleman, as chairman of the conferees, if he is not willing to do what he can to see to it that within the next few days the House has full and free opportunity to pass upon the question of the half-and-half principle.

Mr. SISSON. I am going to say to my friend that the parliamentarians have been very much in doubt as to how we are going to get at it in the House.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am asking the gentleman so far as he is personally concerned. I think the House is entitled to it.

Mr. SISSON. The House will get it, if the gentleman will allow me. Not a single member of the conferees has any disposition other than to carry out the wishes of the House. I believe that the Members upon both sides know me well enough to know that there is not in me one particle of desire to do otherwise than that which the House wants me to do. Why? Because I am the servant of the House. I cease to be a representative individual when I enter the conference. I am there as the representative of the House to represent you to the best of my ability. I do not know how we are going to arrive at the position where I can bring back to the House the question unless by unanimous consent we vacate what we have agreed upon. Some parliamentarians say differently.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Is it not true——

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, this must come to a head pretty soon. I am going to object to any discussion on the merits.

Mr. MONDELL. Does not the present deadlock arise out of the fact that the Senate conferees decline to discuss the questions in dispute with a view of compromising the differences so long as the House insists upon its instructions to its conferees?

Mr. SISSON. No; they did not do that.

Mr. MONDELL. Is not that the practical situation?

Mr. SISSON. Here is what occurred.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman state how long ago this was?

Mr. SISSON. Just before the recess.

Mr. GILLETT. There has been no conference since?

Mr. SISSON. No. The gentleman will understand that there are other reasons why, but let me state what occurred. This happens to be my position, and I am not going to discuss the position of others: When we met I told the conferees my position and the position of the House conferees—that a motion to adhere had been made in the House and therefore we had no proposition to make, and if they had any proposition that they desired to make to us we would report it back to the House. The conferees expressed a good deal of surprise because they had chosen new conferees and did not know that we had adhered. The Senate balled the matter up by not knowing what the House had done. Mr. GALLINGER and Mr. ROBINSON left the city, as I recollect, before this report got back to the Senate, and was acted upon.

Senator UNDERWOOD and Senator CURTIS were appointed to take their places on the conference, and Senator UNDERWOOD and Senator CURTIS were utterly amazed when they found the parliamentary situation and that they themselves had asked for a conference and we had made a motion to adhere. After having made that statement, they did not see what we could do, and since we had no propositions to make they had none to make. That is the status of the whole matter.

Mr. MONDELL. Then, the situation is as I suggested.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is: Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS]?

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will not allow it to be discussed, I object.

Mr. SIMS. We have had about three-quarters of an hour of discussion, and I hope the gentleman will not place his objection upon the ground that we have not had time to discuss it.

Mr. GILLETT. That is one ground upon which I place it.

THE SELECTIVE-DRAFT LAW.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that the conferees have reached a complete agreement upon the draft bill (H. R. 1273). It will be about 3.30 o'clock before the papers can be prepared. I ask unanimous consent, notwithstanding the rule upon the subject, that the House proceed to consider the conference report at 4 o'clock this afternoon. I have spoken to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], in charge of the water-power bill, which has the right of way to-day, and this agreement is agreeable to him. Furthermore, the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] is absent in attendance upon the funeral of Senator JAMES, and in his absence he has designated the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE] to represent the minority, and he agrees to that proposition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to consider the conference report upon the selective-draft bill at 4 o'clock this afternoon. Is there objection?

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I do not intend to object—I think it would be wise if the gentleman in just a minute or two could tell us what the decisions of the conferees is, so that we may know now what we will have to consider.

Mr. DENT. It would take some time for me to do that. I have not had a chance yet to prepare my statement. I have just come out of the conference room.

Mr. CANNON. May I suggest that evidently the committee would rise or the House would suspend consideration of the water-power bill when the gentleman is ready with the conference report and his statement? I have no doubt that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] would agree to that.

Mr. SIMS. I would not object to its being considered.

Mr. DENT. My only purpose in making the request is to give notice to the House, so that they could adjust their arrangements accordingly.

Mr. GILLETT. I think it is wise to have an hour fixed.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman know whether or not the other branch of the Congress will be prepared to act upon the conference report this evening?

Mr. DENT. The understanding that I have with Senator CHAMBERLAIN is that if the House, which has to act first, acts this afternoon he will ask the Senate to remain in session until the report goes over there, and if the House adopts the report the Senate will take immediate action to-day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the chairman if he can state whether or not the conferees agreed to the elimination of the McCulloch amendment.

Mr. DENT. The conferees did agree to the elimination of the McCulloch amendment. I understand that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCCULLOCH] intends—and I know of no reason why he can not do it—when the conference report comes up, to make a motion to recommit with his amendment, so that the House may have an opportunity to vote upon it.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Can the gentleman state from memory that the Senate has agreed to the elimination of the provision respecting the work-or-fight order?

Mr. DENT. The Senate agreed to eliminate the work-or-fight provision.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

APPROPRIATIONS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I demanded the regular order a short time ago, when we were considering the request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], and I understand now that it is probable that with a little further discussion of the matter they may come to some agreement. I desire to withdraw the demand for regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Byrns resolution was objected to by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT].

PRIMARY CONTEST IN NINTH CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT, ALABAMA.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for not exceeding 15 minutes on a matter in the nature of a personal privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, if it is a question of personal privilege, I do not understand that the gentleman has to ask unanimous consent, and unless it is a question of personal privilege I think we ought to know what the gentleman proposes to talk about.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The matter relates to statements made by Members of the House the day before yesterday touching my recent campaign for renomination.

Mr. SIMS. Under those circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I will not object.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise in good humor to call the attention of my fellow Members to the fact that there is no pleasure in being pointed at either as "a shining mark" or as "a horrible example." Such a suggestion on my part seems quite proper in view of the references which were made on the floor of the House on day before yesterday to my recent campaign for renomination.

My name has been and is being bandied about in the press on account of the fact that during my recent campaign in Alabama the President of the United States intervened and in substance expressed the desire that I should not be renominated and by the further fact that notwithstanding such intervention I was renominated, receiving over two strong opponents 60 per cent of the total vote cast. The Prsident's action has caused much comment by the newspapers of the country, which are divided very largely into two factions, the President's critics and the President's friends.

The President's critics, from my point of view, are very largely the organs of the militarists and the big business and reactionary interests, and hence they are able to see no merit in any man who happens to have been at any time a wisher for peace or opposed to vast armaments. Especially are they antagonistic to anyone who opposes the adoption at this time of a permanent system of compulsory military service, so that when after this war our soldiers come home they will find that the yoke of compulsory service has been riveted permanently upon the necks of the people of the United States. And so these gentry, high placed in the land—for wealth and place and reaction can always command the highest order of talent—can see no good in me, and they damn me with plain denunciation and say while it was a shame to renominate me and that I was utterly unworthy to come back to the House, yet the President has done an awful thing in pointing out that fact. So I suffer from these lights of the press, who call me "Socialist" and what-not. I believe that they have come in these days to regard the epithet "pacifist" as the worst they can give and as about equivalent to assassin and highwayman; so they call me that name.

The President's champions, feeling called upon to speak in his behalf, start out by saying that I am so utterly unworthy that it was the bounden duty of the President to call attention to the fact, and that there was no way for him to get around it; the reason which they present for the President's action is that I was so unworthy to come back to the House that it would have been a dereliction on the part of the President had he not struck me.

Now, as will be observed, I am being crushed between two millstones, and it is with a view to asking mercy of my colleagues that I rise. I had hoped that this controversy would be confined to the press. I lament that such is not the case, but that two gentlemen of this House, one on either side of the aisle, have referred to the situation and out of their utter lack of information on the subject have attempted to give the reason why I was renominated and received such a handsome vote from my constituents.

Of course, I can not be very hard on the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG], because he coupled with my name a very flattering adjective, and besides his method of treating the subject did not necessarily involve me personally. He assumed that the people of my district in Alabama, loving State rights, had resented the presidential intervention and had renominated me rather to spite the President than anything else. Well, I should not have noticed that had the matter stopped there. The gentleman's view of the situation is wholly at fault. The President's intervention did me a great injury, cost me many votes. I received only 60 per cent of the total vote, whereas had the President not intervened I believe I would have received 80 to 85 per cent of the vote, notwithstanding I was bitterly opposed by a unanimous daily press, and had against me all the "holier than thou" element and the pseudo patriotic organizations that are so flourishing among the reactionary elements in the land just at this time.

But the case of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] is more serious, and I am compelled to resent his attempt to give the reason why I was renominated. Mr. DEWALT in the course of his speech was interrupted by Mr. GREENE of Vermont, who asked:

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman say who is to constitute the arbiter and judge and the court of honor by which the loyalty of citizens like ourselves is to be decided?

Mr. DEWALT. That is the easiest thing in the world.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Shall one man do it?

Mr. DEWALT. No.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. One man seems to try to do it.

Mr. DEWALT. That resolves itself into this finality, as the gentleman well knows: The people of the district in which the man lives will decide that question; and if the President of the United States falsely makes a charge against an individual, I premise as a fact, to be established in the near future perhaps, that they will repudiate any such charge.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Does the gentleman base that observation on the result of the recent election in a district in Alabama?

Mr. DEWALT. No; I do not. There were other circumstances which led to the result there, and the gentleman possibly knows what they were. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] comes from a highly congested district, a manufacturing district in Birmingham and a portion of the county outside of Birmingham. I understand, although I do not know it positively, that the liquor question came largely into the canvass, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] took the broad ground that these men were not to be deprived of what they had usually had in that regard, and the issue was made up in that way. I may be mistaken in that, as I am only repeating what I have heard.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Then John Barleycorn came to the rescue of the candidate, instead of the administration.

Mr. Speaker, I would not resent many imputations. I am a plain, common man, and not thin-skinned; but I do resent the insinuation that I had the support of the liquor interests in my campaign for Congress. It does me a gross injustice. It does a gross injustice to the noble body of supporters who have renominated me, and I am unwilling that it shall remain unrefuted upon the record. The situation with reference to the President's intervention in my campaign is a very delicate one. It is one that considerations of the public welfare, as well as of delicacy and good taste, forbid, for the present, at least, and except as a last resort, that I should discuss with anything like fullness. But I can not allow the statement to pass that I came back here by virtue of an alliance with the liquor traffic. And I am bound to say that there is not a single word of fact in the statement nor in the impression that was created upon the House.

My position upon the liquor question is well understood. I made a speech on the prohibition amendment when it was before the House, and because it states my views on the question better, perhaps, than I can do it again, I will read an extract from it to the House. It is as follows:

I have been an advocate of prohibition even from my boyhood. As a citizen I have voted for it whenever I consistently could. I voted for prohibition when it was a matter of local option in my home county. I voted for it when it was proposed to put prohibition in the Alabama constitution. As a Member of Congress I voted for prohibition for the District of Columbia, for Porto Rico, and for Alaska. I have voted for it on every occasion when I felt that it was a legitimate subject for Federal legislation. I would gladly vote to put prohibition in the Federal Constitution if my conscience and my principles did not forbid. I am a prohibitionist, but I am also a democrat. I do not mean that I am a democrat merely in the party sense, but that I am a democrat in that I am a believer in the right of self-government—in the right of every community and State to decide questions which concern themselves alone.

* * * * * * *

I believe in prohibition. I look on it as a good thing, but I can not vote to force it on communities remote from my own, of which I have no specific knowledge and in which I have no particular interest. In my own State we already have prohibition. The Federal amendment will be of no benefit to us. It will merely serve to inject the prohibition issue more fully into State politics. This will be harmful to Alabama. It will delay much needed reforms and divert attention from grave public matters of more pressing concern to my State. Alabama through her legislature chose prohibition voluntarily. It was not forced upon us by other States. We accepted it deliberately, not as the result of outside dictation. I am willing to accord to the people of other States the same privilege that Alabama has asserted for herself; that is, to decide for themselves whether they will stop the sale of liquors. I should resent with all my soul any attempt upon the part of a combination of other States by amendment to the Federal Constitution or otherwise to force the liquor traffic upon the people of Alabama. Likewise I shall not take part in an effort to prohibit such traffic in other States, the people of which desire that it should continue.

I voted against the Federal prohibition amendment, but it was well understood by my people at home that I was a prohibitionist. In fact, I consider myself a better prohibitionist—I am sure I have been one longer—than many men who clamored for it and many of those who are now such ardent advocates of prohibition. But I am, as I said then, also a Democrat, and my principles will not permit me to undertake to dictate upon a question of this kind to people of distant States who have the moral and natural right to govern themselves, a right that is secured to them at present under the Constitution of the United States. My views are well known to my people. This speech, of which I have read a portion, was distributed under the title, "Democracy and prohibition" to every voter in my district, and they know exactly where I stand.

I want to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] and to the House that there were not 100 votes in my district influenced by my vote on the amendment. A few extreme prohibitionists, some of them belonging to the inner circle of the political ring that assumes the right to dictate on all matters relating to prohibition, may have voted against me. I am not able to pick out any one of them. There were perhaps a few extremists. On the other hand, knowing that I was a prohibitionist, some extreme advocates of the sale of liquor no doubt refrained from voting in the election—as we know there are a few men who will not vote for a prohibitionist even if there is no one running against him. But no substantial change was made in the result.

The question of my vote on the amendment was not referred to in the campaign. We do not have the sale of liquor in Alabama. There is no saloon element or liquor element in Alabama. The open saloon has gone just as much as the snows of last year. We will never have the sale of liquor in Alabama again, no matter what the people of the United States may do with reference to the Federal amendment. There was no question of that kind involved in the campaign in my State. The only question touching prohibition was whether the legislature which was being selected would ratify the amendment, and there was an earnest desire on the part of many of the people of Alabama to preserve States' rights in principle. Those favoring ratification of the amendment appear to have been in the majority and that is all there is to it. I told my constituents that I had done my duty as I saw it when the matter was before the House, which was enough responsibility for me, and said to them, "It is now up to you, I will be content with what you may do."

I may say also that I was viciously opposed by the two liquor dailies of my city and by all the selfish interests which in prior elections were lined up with the distillers because they expected a financial benefit from the saloon business.

I desire merely to say further, Mr. Speaker, that I will not presume at this time to undertake to tell of all the issues in my campaign nor to express an opinion as to what led to the intervention of the President in that campaign. I will not take that up at this time; but I do hope that Members will not assume, knowing nothing about the situation, to tell how I happened to get renominated. I beg that they "lay off" of the humble Member from the ninth district of Alabama in discussing the President's political activities. [Applause.]

WATER POWER.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the water-power bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 1419, the water-power bill, with Mr. WEBB in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1419) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words of the section for a purpose which I will explain.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman move to strike out the last two words of the first section?

Mr. SIMS. Yes; the last two words of the first section.

Mr. Speaker, on the 23d day of August I received a letter from the President of the United States, written on the 22d of August. On the 22d of August I wrote the President a letter myself and signed it at 6.30 in the afternoon and mailed it; therefore I had not received the President's letter on the 22d when I wrote mine and he had not received mine when he wrote his. I wish now to have read the letter of the President of the 22d instant and then my letter, and then the reply of the President to my letter, which was dated the 26th of August and which I did not receive until the 27th. At the present I will make no comment or explanation until later in the consideration of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. May I ask the distinguished chairman a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is this letter of the President at all at variance with the views of the three Secretaries, members of his Cabinet?

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman will have to judge of that when he hears the letter read.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Is this a correspondence course in legislation? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, 22 August, 1918.

MY DEAR MR. SIMS: I am going to venture to say to you as chairman of the special water-power committee what I hope that you will not think I am taking too great a liberty in saying, namely, that inasmuch as the House of Representatives has four times passed a water-power bill, each time with a recapture clause practically identical with the pending water-power bill as it was originally proposed by the administration and agreed upon in informal conference, I am very much in hopes that it will be the judgment of the House to reject the committee amendment and recur to the original bill in the form in which it was delivered to Mr. POU, of the Rules Committee, for introduction and consideration by the Congress. I am very much concerned about this feature of the bill and have had the privilege of being so intimately associated with those who have from time to time conferred about it that I am venturing to make this earnest suggestion.

Sincerely, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

Hon. THETUS W. SIMS,
House of Representatives.

Mr. SIMS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask that my letter to the President, written the same day but before I received the President's letter, be read.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Did the gentleman, in his letter to the President, inclose a copy of the minority report?

Mr. SIMS. I will answer when the letter is read. The letter that is now to be read was written before I received the President's letter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES UNITED STATES,
COMMITTEE ON WATER POWER,
Washington, D. C., August 22, 1918.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: General debate on the water-power bill has closed. Further consideration has been postponed until the man-power bill passes the House, but we will probably have time to take up the water-power bill and finish its consideration before the Ways and Means Committee will have the revenue bill ready for consideration. We are therefore in the amendment stage of the bill, which is the all-important stage.

As the bill was finally reported by the committee there is no matter of serious difference except the so-called net-investment amendment. As you know, Mr. FERRIS is very bitterly opposed to that amendment. Mr. DOREMUS agrees with him, and so do I, but as chairman having charge of the bill and representing a majority of the committee, rather than my personal views, it is rather embarrassing for me to do what I feel my duty will require me to do in the present case.

You requested the three Secretaries to prepare a bill for you. Naturally I must suppose that they gave the preparation of that bill their most deliberate and serious consideration. You presented the bill they had prepared and given you and which met with your approval as a basis upon which you asked that a special committee be created by special rule in order that all questions of water-power legislation should be included in one bill. You stated to us at the time we met you in conference that you approved the fundamental provisions of the bill. You finally gave the bill to Mr. POU, chairman of the Committee on Rules, so that it might not appear that you had any feeling or preference as between the several committees that had heretofore had jurisdiction of water-power legislation.

Mr. POU immediately had the bill printed and a thousand copies of same distributed among the Members of the House. This was all done before the Committee on Rules had brought in a rule providing for the establishment of a special committee in compliance with your request. Being satisfied with the fundamental provisions of the bill I strongly urged the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to agree to this special rule. Mr. DOREMUS helped me in the matter, but it was rather an uphill task to get the committee to agree to it, but finally it did so. The fundamentals of that bill were given to the House as the deliberately considered necessary provisions of a water-power bill carefully prepared by the three Secretaries, carefully scrutinized by yourself, and approved by all concerned. The House, feeling it to be the last word from both you and the three Secretaries, adopted the rule creating the committee. The committee was appointed, and I was honored with the chairmanship of same. But the railroad-control bill was then up for consideration by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, therefore I could not call the Water Power Committee together or take any steps whatever in the consideration of the proposed water-power bill.

Several weeks after the committee had been created Mr. O. C. Merrill, chief engineer of the Bureau of Forestry in the Department of Agriculture, came to see me and stated to me that the three Secretaries requested that this bill which you had given us be referred back to the three Secretaries, that there were certain amendments which the three Secretaries wanted in the interest of clarity and simplicity. I told Mr. Merrill that the bill which you had given to us and which had been printed at the request of Mr. POU was not a pending bill before the committee in the sense that it could be referred by committee action, but that if the three Secretaries desired to look over the bill with a view to changing its phraseology, thereby making it more clear and simple, they could do so, and the committee would take up their suggestions and consider same when organized.

About two weeks afterwards Mr. Merrill came to my committee room late one afternoon and brought what he said was a bill with the suggested amendments proposed by the three Secretaries and also handed me a letter signed by the Secretaries. Assuming, of course, that the amendments had been submitted to you by the three Secretaries and approved by you, I never even read the bill or the letter, but went immediately to the floor of the House and had a thousand copies of the amended bill printed at once and also a thousand copies of the letter.

It was a number of days after that time when Mr. FERRIS asked me if I had read these proposed amendments. I told him I had not. He suggested that I read them immediately, as he regarded the changes made in the bill as fundamental. I then read the bill and found that Mr. FERRIS was exactly right; that instead of changing the phraseology so that the fundamental provisions of the bill would be more easily understood that the basic provisions of the bill had been completely changed. For instance, the bill you gave us provided for a license period of not exceeding 50 years. This had been changed to a specific, arbitrary 50-year period with no power to provide for a less period without the consent of the licensee. A second license period was provided for the holder of the original license, and the tender of this second license was made mandatory upon the part of the commission. The recapture provision of the bill you gave us provided for recapture upon a basis of fair value not exceeding actual cost. This provision was stricken out almost bodily and the so-called net-investment provision substituted for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for an extension sufficient to complete the reading of that letter.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KNUTSON. How much longer will it take to finish?

Mr. SIMS. Only a few minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the request is granted.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading.

The Clerk read as follows:

It is evident to me that the Secretaries never considered these amendments as thoroughly as they should have been considered. I could never believe that radically fundamental changes in the bill would have been suggested and pressed by the three Secretaries without first being submitted to you and having your approval.

Now, in all fairness and justice to myself as chairman of the Water Power Committee and to the members of the three committees and to the House of Representatives, who concurred in making a revolutionary change in the procedure of the House in order to consider a bill given to us by you, that radical and fundamental changes in that bill should not have been prepared and suggested by the Secretaries and given the stamp of administration approval without you or any member of the committee being consulted as to the effect these proposed changes would have upon the bill.

I, of course, took it for granted that Mr. Merrill was in all good faith representing the Secretaries in doing what he did and that they were doing what you approved. I feel absolutely sure that neither the committee nor the House of Representatives would have suggested any such amendments or would have consented to them on any other theory than that they had received your consideration and approval. The committee has acted on all the amendments, but the net-investment amendment is the bone of contention, and I ask you, if you are willing to do so, to let me know whether or not these proposed amendments were submitted to you and whether or not they were approved by you, especially the net-investment amendment as written in the reported bill.

I would like very much to have your reply before we begin considering the bill for amendment, because I feel in all good faith I must oppose this net-investment amendment.

I must assume that the three Secretaries gave the whole matter exhaustive consideration before they handed you a bill. If they did so and then afterwards radically changed almost every fundamental provision of the bill it is to me a very strange proceeding. Therefore, I can not believe that they did so with a thorough knowledge of the effect of the amendments upon the bill.

Very sincerely, yours,

T. W. SIMS, Chairman.

THE PRESIDENT,
The White House.

Mr. SIMS. Then the President's letter in reply.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, August 26, 1918.

MY DEAR MR. SIMS: Pardon me for not having replied sooner to your important letter of August 22.

I am free to reply to it that I did not see the draft of amendments to the water-power bill which were introduced by Mr. Merrill and his associates after the bill was first put in the hands of your special committee. I do not approve of them, and it is my earnest hope that the Congress will see fit to pass the bill as it was originally drafted and provisionally agreed upon in our informal conference.

Cordially and sincerely, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

Hon. THETUS W. SIMS,
House of Representatives.

Mr. SINNOTT and Mr. HUMPHREYS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Oregon rise?

Mr. SINNOTT. I would like to be recognized to oppose the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon is recognized.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, we have just had read two letters from the President. I desire to read two other letters writen by the same distinguished gentleman. One is found on page 273 of the work entitled "Congressional Government," by Woodrow Wilson. He states in this letter:

No one, I take it for granted, is disposed to disallow the principle that the representatives of the people are the proper ultimate authority in all matters of government, and that administration is merely the clerical part of government. Legislation is the originating force; it determines what shall be done. And the President, if he can not or will not stay legislation by the use of his extraordinary power as a branch of the legislature, is plainly bound in duty to render unquestioning obedience to Congress. And if it be his duty to obey, still more is obedience the bounden duty of his subordinates. The power of making laws is in its very nature and essence the power of directing, and that power is given to Congress. The principle is without drawback and is inseparably of a piece with all Anglo-Saxon usage.

Then I quote from another letter by the same distinguished gentleman, in his work on constitutional government in the United States:

There are illegitimate means by which the President may influence the action of Congress. He may bargain with Members not only with regard to appointments but also with regard to legislative measures. He may use his local patronage to assist Members to get or retain their seats. He may interpose his powerful influence in one covert way or another in contests for places in the Senate. * * * Such things are not only deeply immoral, they are destructive of the fundamental understandings of constitutional government itself. They are sure, moreover, in a country of free public opinion to bring their own punishment, to destroy both the fame and the power of the man who dares to practice them.

I thought that these two letters should appear in the same RECORD with the others. [Applause.]

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oregon has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

This first section of the bill provides for a commission to be known as the Federal power commission, to be composed of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of Agriculture, prescribing their duties and setting some, though not many, limitations to their powers. I should like to call the attention of the chairman of the committee and of the members of the committee to the fact that for several years there has been insistence upon legislation providing for the creation of some sort of a commission, to have power in matters touching the development of water power and the regulation of navigation, and the disposition of all the useful purposes of our waterways. More than a year ago we created a commission for that purpose. We were told then that that commission was created in accordance with the wishes of the very three Secretaries who are mentioned in this bill. That provision was carried in the river and harbor bill, and we were told then by those who were interested in the passage of that bill that it was very necessary, if the bill was ever to become the law of the land, that section 18, which provides for the commission, should be incorporated in it. Now, I think section 1, providing for this commission, should be stricken from this bill—I think the gentleman will agree to that—or else we ought to repeal section 18 of that river and harbor bill. We ought not to have two commissions set to do the same work, both demanding the same initial appropriation to carry on the work, with very little limitation set to their power.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. For a question.

Mr. RAKER. The power given the commission in the river and harbor act relates solely to investigation and report, does it not?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. While this bill authorizes the granting of permits and licenses.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. And whatever information that commission should gather—they have not been appointed yet—this commission provided for in the pending water-power bill could call for and use in the prosecution of their work.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. It may be desirable to create one commission with power to go out and get a lot of information and pay its members $7,500 a year, authorize them to employ all the experts they want, and give them $100,000 to start with, and then before that commission is appointed create another commission and give them $100,000 and tell them to go out and do the same identical work, and excuse it by saying, "Well, the second commission will take whatever information the first commission give them." I say it is a wicked waste of money. Let me read the provisions of section 18 of the river and harbor bill approved August 8, 1917. Here is what we deliberately enacted into law last year, with the undertsanding that it was satisfactory all the way along the line, and that nothing short of it would be satisfactory:

SEC. 18. That a commission, to be known as the Waterways Commission, consisting of seven members to be appointed by the President of the United States, at least one of whom shall be chosen from the active or retired list of the Engineers Corps of the Army, at least one of whom shall be an expert hydraulic engineer from civil life, and the remaining five of whom may each be selected either from civil life or the public service.

It was worded that way in order that the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture might be named on this commission. It is a rather remarkable provision. Now listen to the rest of this.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

Mr. SIMS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Mississippi be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Now listen to this—

Is hereby created and authorized, under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe, and subject to the approval of the heads of the several executive departments concerned—

The President prescribes these rules, but he has to get the approval of his Secretaries after he prescribes them. Now, here is what it does—I can state it more briefly than I can read it—here is this commission, consisting of seven members, with salaries of $7,500 a year each, with an initial appropriation of $100,000, to make all these investigations, and here is what this commission can do. I requested the gentleman from Louisiana, Judge WILSON, a very able lawyer, to make a critical examination of the section prescribing the powers of this commission, to analyze it and see just what they can do. Here is what the National Waterways Commission heretofore created can do, and here are its powers: It has the power to adopt rules and regulations, to form such organization and appoint such personnel as it may deem advisable, to fix salaries, and so forth; by which it is to bring into cooperation and coordination—exactly what you propose here—first, the engineering; second, the scientific and construction services; third, the bureaus; fourth, the boards; fifth, the commissions of the governmental departments of the United States; sixth, the commissions created by Congress that relate to study, development, and control of waterways, water resources, and related subjects, or the development and regulation of interstate and foreign commerce; with a view of uniting such services in investigating with respect to all watersheds in the United States questions relating to development, improvement, regulation, control of navigation as a part of interstate and foreign commerce, including therein the related subjects of irrigation, drainage, forestry, arid and swamp land reclamation, clarification of streams, regulation of flow, control of floods, utilization of water power, prevention of soil erosion and waste, storage and conservation of water for agricultural, industrial, municipal, and domestic uses, cooperation of railways and waterways, and promotion of terminal and transfer facilities and sites, and so forth.

Now, there is a commission already created under the law, seven men getting each $7,500 a year, to make this investigation and employ experts. There is no limitation upon their power to employ all the experts they want, whether they are water-power experts, experts on the reclamation of arid lands, or anything else. They can give us all that data and submit their report to Congress.

Now, you come along with this bill, with that commission created deliberately and purposely, with the Secretaries mentioned here as a part of it. You do not repeal the first law, the commission still stands, still ready to exercise its functions, still drawing its pay, and you come along with this other commission.

So far as the water power is concerned the duties of both commissions are identical.

Mr. ESCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Yes.

Mr. ESCH. Is the gentleman referring to the waterways commission?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Yes.

Mr. ESCH. That commission has not been appointed.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. It is authorized by Congress and the appropriation made.

Mr. ESCH. Let me say to the gentleman that in the course of the hearings I propounded the question whether or not we could not utilize that waterways commission for the purposes of this act and avoid the creation of another commission, and the Secretaries seemed to be strongly of the opinion that a separate commission should be created.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. They evidently had some strong reason for that opinion, and it would be very interesting to the House if their reasons and not their conclusions were given.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, I ask to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, I think the gentleman is making an argument that ought to be heard by more members of the committee. I do not mean the Committee of the Whole, but more members of the special committee on waterways, and while I am strongly tempted to make the point of no quorum——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman knows that it is the lunch hour and many are out on legitimate business. [Laughter.]

Mr. WALSH. In view of that observation I will not make the point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has the gentleman any information as to why the waterways commission has not been appointed?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I have not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Are not the functions of that committee being performed by an inland waterways committee under the direction of the Director General of Railroads?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I do not think so. This waterway commission was authorized to employ or retain and fix the compensation for the services of such engineers, transportation experts, experts on water development, utilization, and structures, as it might be necessary to make such investigation to carry out the purposes of this section, and $100,000 was appropriated in order to enable them to go out and perform these services.

Now, I submit that there is no justification and there is no reason—I do not care if the various Cabinet officers did say to the committee that they thought they should be given the power carried in this bill—there is no reason or justification for the creation of another commission to do this very same thing. All of us know that the Cabinet officers are not going to do the work. The Cabinet officers have their hands entirely full now, and they will and necessarily must detail somebody else in the various departments to perform these services.

This House, after several years of conference with these Cabinet officers, created this commission. After several years of discussion, as I understood it last year from the chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, they all finally got together and agreed that that commission should be authorized, and so worded the act, that three of these Cabinet officers could be members of it, but they must have the assistance of four other gentlemen, who would be appointed by the President to act in this capacity, and it was created, carrying salaries of $7,500 each. Before that act gets cold we are asked to create another commission to go out and spend another hundred thousand dollars.

This Waterways Commission has got $100,000 to make these investigations for these water-power sites, and to report to Congress data, and now we are starting out with another commission to spend another $100,000 and many hundreds of thousands of dollars. It will take a good many millions to make the survey of the watershed of the Ohio River alone—not $100,000—and both these commissions are authorized to do it.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. Is it the gentleman's idea that the powers proposed to be conferred in this bill should be conferred upon the commission about which he has been talking?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. Is it the gentleman's intention to offer an amendment which will accomplish that result?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Absolutely. If we strike out section 1, then, in section 4 we could add the words:

That the Waterways Commission, hereinafter referred to as the commission, is hereby authorized and empowered—

And so forth.

Then you have got your commission appointed, with its $100,000 already appropriated, to make the investigation. Then you can proceed with your bill. I do not mean to say that I am for the bill after that is done, and I do not wish to be understood as committing myself to this bill, even if it is done, but I say that it is a wicked, useless thing to create two commissions and turn them loose with no limitation upon their power to spend the public money in the same work.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has again expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to say only one or two words in reply to the gentleman from Mississippi. As a matter of course Congress has absolute power and jurisdiction to adopt the amendment which the gentleman from Mississippi has proposed and to confer the powers that are conferred upon the commission created in this bill upon that commission. There is no question about that; that can be done by Congress.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. It can be done by this amendment.

Mr. SIMS. Yes. The question is whether it is prudent or not. This commission to which the gentleman referred has seven members drawing $7,500 a year, but they have not yet been appointed. I do not know why they have not been appointed. It will cost over $50,000 a year; and I suppose, as a matter of fact, in that, as part of the commission, the three Secretaries will draw no salary as members of that commission. So it would be about $30,000 more in commission salaries. But the commission to which the gentleman referred, if it discharges all the duties imposed upon it, will have to spend a great many hundred thousand dollars and will have to have a very large force, while this commission is empowered only to execute the water-power development law as embraced in this bill.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. No; if the gentleman will yield. This commission authorized in this bill is charged with the responsibility of making investigations and collecting this data, and they can not make that investigation except by sending these engineers out to survey these water sheds at the cost of many hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Mr. SIMS. I think the gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Oh, no; I am not mistaken.

Mr. SIMS. In the first place, this commission under this bill will send out nobody to do anything except when some person or corporation applies for a permit or a license. Then, before the license is granted, I take it, the commission will have that particular project to which the license is applied investigated and reported upon. But they can do that with their own force. There are expert men who are under the War Department, expert engineers that are under the Interior Department, and expert engineers under the Agricultural Department, and they can use the force which they already have because it is a limited investigation only as to the power sites for which the license has been applied for.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. My point of order is that there is no quorum of the committee present. It is absolutely absurd to consider this bill with 25 or 30 Members present.

Mr. SIMS. I am through with what I intended to say.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of no quorum?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. WEBB, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill S. 1419, and, finding itself without a quorum, under the rule the roll was called, whereupon 232 Members answered to their names, and he presented therewith the list of absentees to be recorded in the Journal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The committee will resume its sitting.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, in order that the members of the committee may understand clearly just what the proposition now pending is, I want to restate it——

The CHAIRMAN. What request does the gentleman from Minnesota make?

Mr. ANDERSON. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Mississippi has made a motion to strike out the first section of the bill, which creates the commission empowered to administer the act. He asserts that it is his purpose, if this motion prevails, to offer an amendment charging the commission created by the recent river and harbor act with the duties and obligations which are in this bill imposed upon the commission created by the first section. When this bill was first under consideration by the committee I was of the opinion that the whole question of water-power development was of sufficient magnitude and of sufficient importance to warrant the creation of a commission which should have no other duty except the duty of developing the water power of the country under the act. I was very strongly of that opinion; I still entertain that opinion. But, Mr. Chairman, the committee, or a majority of the committee, did not agree with me upon that proposition, and, unlike the chairman of the committee, I propose to be bound by the action of the committee upon this particular proposition. [Applause.] There are some reasons why, however desirable it may be to have a commission which has no other duty at all except administering the provisions of this act, that particular thing can not feasibly be done. The Secretary of War is charged with certain duties touching navigable waters. He is charged with the obligation of maintaining those waters in a navigable condition for military purposes. That power can not properly be taken away from him; and yet, if all power to deal with navigable waters provided in this bill were conferred upon a commission separate and distinct from the Secretary of War, it might, it could, it probably would interfere with the control of those waters for military purposes. Again, the Secretary of Agriculture, having jurisdiction of the national forests, of some national monuments and national parks, is charged with certain duties touching the preservation of the scenic beauties and the nonpollution of the waters within those monuments, parks, and forests.

The creation of a commission having the sole power to deal with water powers within those parks would interfere and in many instances be inconsistent with the power now possessed by the Secretary of Agriculture and which he ought to continue to have. The same sort of an argument might be made with respect to the powers now exercised by the Secretary of the Interior touching the public lands. And these considerations, urged over and over and over again in the committee, led me to dispose of my own personal inclination touching the matter and to stand by the bill as it is now proposed.

I want now to advert to what occurred here a few minutes ago. A letter was read from the President of the United States requesting or expressing the hope that a certain amendment, the net investment amendment, put in the bill by the committee, should be stricken out and the original text of the bill restored. I have no criticism whatever to offer upon the action of the President in this matter or upon any matter in which he undertakes to impress his views by the exercise of his influence or the expression of his views in a public way, and I assume that it was always the intention that the letter sent to the chairman of the committee by the President should be made public. I have not been a Member of the House very long but during the time I have been here there have been a great many changes in the rules, written and unwritten, and with many of those changes I am in entire accord. When I came here it was the unwritten rule, seldom, I think, if ever violated, that the chairman of the committee, regardless of his own views, when his committee had once agreed upon a bill, was obliged to fight for the bill and defend it against all comers whomsoever they were, but now that rule, sanctified by 100 years of legislative experience, has been overturned and we find the chairman of this committee writing the President of the United States a letter in order that he may get an instrument with which he can submarine his colleagues.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I will.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the gentleman's attention to what I think is a fact. He is a very fair man, I have found him to be so, that it was said from the beginning in the consideration of the water-power bill that any member of the committee was free to offer or oppose or favor any amendment that might be offered upon the floor of the House, and now I expect to support this bill whether the net investment amendment stays in or goes out.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman, the chairman of the committee, made the report upon which the Members of this House were supposed to come to some conclusion of what their duty was respecting it. I do not criticize him if he wants to support an amendment to this bill but I think he is subject to criticism when he writes the President of the United States in order to get, as I said before, the means whereby he may submarine his colleagues touching a bill which he has reported. Now, that is all I have to say upon this subject.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I shall take no part in the controversy between the gentleman from Minnesota and the chairman of the committee other than to say the chairman of the committee has always been against this proposed net-investment amendment and gentlemen on the other side with equal force have advocated it. They, of course, had a perfect right to advocate it. The chairman has a perfect right to occupy the other position. What I do desire to say is in opposition to the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS], if he had any earnestness or seriousness in offering it at all, which I do not think he had. He proposed to strike out the first section of the bill, which creates the administrative commission to operate this water-power bill. Of course, that means, or would imply, that the gentleman from Mississippi was against any water-power legislation at all, which, I am sure, is not true.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] has been a student of water power for a long time, and has been a very helpful one, and has assisted the House in carrying on water-power legislation.

Something like a year or more ago a Senate amendment was added on, known as the Newlands amendment, creating a very elaborate water-power commission, made up of seven members, with salaries of $7,500 each, and so forth. The amendment was never given consideration in this House. It was put in by the committee, and was struck out on a point of order, and the House gave no attention to it whatever. It created a commission of seven members. It is not a water-power commission. It is a commission that assumes to do most everything, but it has never even been appointed; it has never really become more than a paper commission, and I assume will never be. And I think the gentleman from Mississippi is entirely right in saying that we have too many commissions. If the gentleman will offer an amendment to abolish that commission I shall be glad to vote with him. Of course, in frankness it ought to be said it would be subject to a point of order, and if the members of the Flood Control Committee and the members of the River and Harbor Committee want to strike it out they could strike out the amendment by a point of order.

I want to be entirely fair with the gentleman. I again state that the gentleman from Mississippi has been a helpful student of water power in this House for a long time, and I, as one who has had a little to do with it, must make grateful acknowledgement to him. I was merely disappointed to find him moving to strike out the first paragraph in the bill, which is the heart of it.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. The gentleman understands my motion was to strike out the first section, with the statement that I would then move to amend section 4?

Mr. FERRIS. I understand.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Your first section creates a new commission——

Mr. FERRIS. Made up of three Cabinet officers, who now have jurisdiction of the water power of the country. That is precisely what is desired, precisely what was agreed upon, precisely what ought to be agreed upon.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. And which does not mean anything, with all due respect. Three Cabinet officers are not going to attend to it. That we all know. They are going to appoint somebody else.

Mr. FERRIS. They are attending to it now. They will attend to it. They drew the line. They are the very ones who know most about it.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. We have not had any attention paid to the water power in this country by anybody.

Mr. FERRIS. Let me proceed a little further. The gentleman had 20 minutes and I am going to take only 5.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. The gentleman will get more time. He deflected me. [Laughter.]

Mr. FERRIS. All right. I was only trying to hang on to my modest five minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. My proposition is simply not to create a new commission, but let the commission already created do the things he proposes to do there.

Mr. FERRIS. I will reply to that. That is the gentleman's position and that is the thing I want to make answer to. The commission that the gentleman proposes to put into this bill by later amendment which he proposes to offer, from his statement just made, was a Senate amendment creating a committee of seven, paying them $7,500 apiece, to go out and gather information—a kind of roving commission.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Including these three Secretaries.

Mr. FERRIS. Now, wait a minute. Let me go ahead now. That commission has never been appointed. I assume it never will be appointed. It never ought to be appointed.

Now, if appointed or created they have no power to issue franchises; they have no power to develop water power. This is a water-power bill; it is not a roving-commission bill; and the first section of it has the provision that the three Secretaries that now have water-power jurisdiction and are now entertaining and functioning water-power jurisdiction shall go on and act in conjunction as distinguished from separate and distinct action. It provides for coordination of the three departments, and I submit that is as it should be. The Secretary of the Interior is now administering the water power to public lands. That is true, is it not? The Secretary of War is administering it on navigable streams. That is true, is it not? And the Secretary of Agriculture is administering the water power on the 365,000,000 acres of forest reserve. That is true, is it not?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I can not answer that.

Mr. FERRIS. I can. I will answer it myself, and say it is true. It is a fact. And they already have the bureaus. The War Department has a Board of Engineers, the Department of the Interior has the Geological Survey and the water-power division, and the Secretary of Agriculture has a water-power division; and this bill proposes to bundle together those three Secretaries and the three water-power bureaus and make one of them, instead of three.

Now, to hold on to any of these outside commissions I think is folly. Whether you can get rid of them or not, I do not know. I am willing to vote for an amendment to get rid of these other commissions, but it will be subject to a point of order, and I suppose some river-and-harbor man or some flood-control man will make a point of order and knock it out. If we want this legislation, which is proposed to be a comprehensive measure, and propose to develop the water-power interests of the country, we should certainly not strike out the first section of the bill. I hope the House will sustain the committee, at least, and not strike out the heart of the bill at the beginning of it.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman has had 20 minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Yes; when nobody was here.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] suggests that this Waterways Commission, as it is called, created a year ago, is a roving commission, with no special power, but that this commission, authorized and created in the first section of this bill, is going to take the various scientific and appropriate agencies that are now distributed throughout the different departments and coordinate them. Now, I call the gentleman's attention to the power of the Waterways Commission created a year ago.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. Does the gentleman contend that the Waterways Commission, created by the Newlands amendment, has any power to issue franchises for water power?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Not a bit.

Mr. FOSTER. We can confer the power in this.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. That is what I propose to do at the "first shake out of the box," though I do not suppose the gentleman knows what that expression means.

Mr. FERRIS. I do.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. The first power conferred on the Waterways Commission is this—"to bring into coordination and cooperation the engineering and scientific and constructive services of the various boards and commissions of the several governmental departments of the United States and all commissions created by Congress that relate in any way to the development of water power or any of the other public uses of water." That commission is created with that power. They are authorized to employ scientific agents outside of the bureau.

They are authorized to employ experts to make investigations such as this commission is authorized to make. There is no limitation whatever upon their power to spend money except as Congress limits the power by appropriation, and $100,000 is given to them to go out and make the investigations.

Now, the first section of this bill proposes to create a new commission, although this other commission is already in existence, and the law so worded that these three Secretaries may be appointed to it. That was the understanding here, although the gentleman from Oklahoma says it was done without consideration. It was done with prayerful consideration. The House passed that bill because it was stated here by the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors that if we ever expected a river and harbor bill to be written on the statute books we must put this provision for the commission on it.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman would not impose that provision on us.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. It was forced on us.

Mr. FERRIS. Then you ought to force it out.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. You can not do that. It is the law of the land. Seven men are to be appointed, to draw $7,500 a year each; a commission, three of whom may, under the law as it is written, be the three Secretaries who are mentioned in this bill. It was stated in private conversation, but I do not know whether it was declared on the floor of the House or not, that those three Cabinet officers would be of the commission, plus these civil experts.

Now, as I say, that is the law of the land. I submit that it is a deliberate waste of money to come here in the face of that and create another commission to do exactly the same thing, to go out and employ any number of experts, to detail any number from the various departments to investigate these water-power sites and assemble the information and the data and have it printed and brought to Congress, and then have those others go out and do exactly the same thing.

Now, one of these commissions is superfluous. In view of the fact that the other is already the law of the land, with Executive approval—and it was stated here at the time that it had the approval of the Secretaries; that is what we were told—with that already on the statute books, why not give them this particular work to do? I submit to the gentleman that that ought to be done instead of creating a new commission with the hope—the vain hope—that by some legislative legerdemain we can ever repeal any law creating any commission. That is as the laws of the Medes and Persians. When you create a commission here and give a man a good salary we can not, even under the war power of the Constitution, ever repeal that law.

Mr. FERRIS. They have not been given any salary or any office, so that that would be an easy matter.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. The President, you must understand, has had tremendous burdens on him. He has not had time hitherto to give his attention to it. No doubt he will do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired. The Chair wishes to make an announcement that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] has requested him to make, and that is that copies of the printed conference report on the selective-draft law have been received at the desk.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman from Alabama wants it read for the benefit of the House.

Mr. DENT. I understood that the Chairman has just stated that I had secured 100 copies of the printed conference report on the draft bill which I left with the Clerk, so that the Members who desire can get copies of it.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in five minutes, unless some other gentleman wants time.

Mr. ESCH. Time is wanted on this side.

Mr. SIMS. Then I ask that all debate on this motion of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] to strike out the first section and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes, one half to be used on this side and the other half on that side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the debate on the pending amendment and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes, one half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee and the other half by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, the motion to strike out the first section is important, and from the hearings and a careful analysis of the entire situation I am constrained to say that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] does not seem to grasp the purpose of the commission provided for in the river and harbor act of August 8, 1917, and the business now pending before the House. As has been stated, and stated clearly, this present bill simply picks up this subject from the three departments and places it in one commission consisting of these heads. It does more than that, in that it coordinates with all the other branches of the Government and authorizes and direct that this commission may use all the information and data and knowledge that the Government has upon this subject. This bill is for the purpose of trying to dispose, for the purpose of use in a legitimate way, of all the great water-power properties of the country to municipalities, to States, to individuals, and to associations and corporations that may qualify under the act according to rules and regulations to be provided, to the end that the Government may have control over them and at the same time that they may be compelled so to conduct their business and so to make their charges that the consuming public shall get fair service at a reasonable price. The extent of the investigations of the commission provided in this bill is in accordance with the applications that are made for permits, and not otherwise. That is one of the things that ought to have been enlarged, but we believed that we had gone as far as we could under this legislation.

This is to make a thing that is going to waste usable, and nothing else. There is no use in our losing our heads over a commission such as is provided for in the river and harbor bill. It has no relation to this bill. Possibly when the time comes, if the President appoints commissioners, they will be qualified to carry out the provisions of that act, which makes a nation-wide investigation to determine our water resources, to determine questions of navigation, the improvement of navigation, to determine questions of drainage and forestry, and arid and swamp land reclamation, and so forth. Now, that is not provided for in this bill only in so far as it relates to the particular subject and the particular project in hand, and neither the gentleman from Mississippi nor anyone else can point out that this commission by virtue of an application filed for a permit or license in the State of Montana can go down to Mississippi and investigate the water resources there.

There is no doubt on earth about it. The amendment in the river and harbor act is all absorbing for the purpose of finding out the resources generally of this country, wherever they might be, in relation to the subject therein specified, not in one particular locality where an application is made, not one particular State.

It is claimed now that we have 60,000,000 horsepower undeveloped on streams that can be used now. It is fairly estimated that there is 200,000,000 horsepower that can be developed by virtue of proper restraining dams and other structures erected for the purpose of holding back the water.

The motion of the gentleman from Mississippi is to strike out the first section of this bill now, when we are starting to consider the water-power bill. There is a law on the statute books with regard to navigable rivers, and there is a law on the statute books with regard to nonnavigable streams on the public lands and in the forest reserves, and there is a statute in regard to streams on the public domain; but in the case of the two latter, namely, in the forest reserves and on the public domain, the permit granted is a revocable permit. It is considered that no municipality or individual or association can be justified in receiving or asking for a revocable permit and spend large sums of money, and the next day after that have that permit revoked, as has been done.

The purpose of this bill is to place it in the hands of some department, so that the Government can legitimately dispose of its property, to the end that these municipalities, States, and corporations may with safety ask and, after they have received, invest their money and build up great hydroelectric enterprises, whereby power may be generated and floods may be controlled, so far as that particular locality is concerned. But the provisions of section 18 of the river and harbor bill do not apply to this particular bill, and ought not to be injected into this bill unless you are willing to say that you are not going to take an inventory of the hydraulic resources of this country. Why, one of the distinguished men who appeared before the committee was a gentleman from New York——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. RAKER. I reserve the balance of our time.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, in the two bills reported to the House by the Committee on the Public Lands the power to issue grants was reserved in the Secretary of the Interior. In the Shields bill, providing for dams over navigable waters, the power to issue grants was placed in the hands of the Secretary of War. In the two Adamson bills reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce the power to issue grants was reserved in Congress. I have always advocated the latter policy, believing that where such vast power was lodged and where such great interests were involved, and where the welfare of multitudes of people was concerned, no one man should hold their destiny in his hands. For that reason I have uniformly contended that this power of issuing grants should abide where it has always abided—in Congress. But in indorsing the pending measure I have made concessions, and I am here to stand for the proposition as enunciated in the bill. I believe that where we have the power to issue grants resting in the three Cabinet officers we in large measure obviate the objection I formerly had to lodging the power in the hands of one man. It is that fact that has largely won me over to the provision contained in section 1.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] desires to have the existing Waterways Commission placed in the bill as a substitution for the commission that we herein create. If he will read that provision of the river and harbor act creating the Waterways Commission, he will find that it gives to that commission no mandatory powers whatsoever, but only powers of recommendation after investigation. This bill gives to this commission of three Cabinet officers great power, I concede, but mandatory powers to carry out the provisions of the bill in the issuing of the grant and in seeing that the provisions of the law and of the license granted thereunder are complied with. Now, in that view I believe that we can afford to support the recommendations of the committee, for the creation of a commission consisting of three Cabinet officers involves no additional expenditure. It gives to that commission the right of making investigations of regions and watersheds sufficient to give all the necessary data required by anybody desiring to make a water-power improvement. Therefore this commission would do the work which was to have been done by the Waterways Commission, but the giving of the power prescribed in this bill makes it less necessary for us to create the personnel of the Waterways Commission. That personnel has not yet been appointed, although the law creating the commission has been in existence for over a year. If this bill becomes operative as planned, there will be less likelihood of the personnel of the Waterways Commission being created. So I hope that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] will not be sustained and that we will sustain the proposition of a commission consisting of three Cabinet officers with an executive secretary costing $5,000 per annum, utilizing all the machinery of the three departments to carry out the plans and purposes of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. If no gentleman cares to speak, the question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS].

The question being taken, the amendment of Mr. HUMPHREYS was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the commission shall appoint an executive secretary, who shall receive a salary of $5,000 a year, and prescribe his duties. The work of the commission shall, in so far as practicable, be performed by and through the Departments of War, Interior, and Agriculture, respectively.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman can not interrupt the reading.

Mr. RAKER. I can submit a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. WALSH. Not until the section is read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will finish the reading of the section.

Mr. RAKER. That is just what I want to know. Let us determine now whether or not we shall consider the bill by paragraphs, as the bill is divided, much of it, into paragraphs and subdivisions—(a), (b), and (c)—or whether we shall dispose of it by sections.

Mr. WALSH. There has not been any arrangement made to read it by paragraphs, so of course it is to be read by sections.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will finish the reading of the section, and then the Chair will recognize the gentleman from California.

The Clerk read as follows:

All of the expenses of the commission, including rent in the District of Columbia, all necessary expenses for transportation and subsistence, including, in the discretion of the commission, a per diem of not exceeding $4 per day in lieu of subsistence incurred by the commissioners or by their employees under their orders in making any investigation, or conducting field work, or upon official business outside of the District of Columbia and away from their designated points of duty, shall be allowed and paid on the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor approved by a member or officer of the commission duly authorized for that purpose; and in order to defray the expenses made necessary by the provisions of this act there is hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as Congress may hereafter determine, and the sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, available until expended, to be paid out upon warrants drawn on the Secretary of the Treasury upon order of the commission.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the section.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard on his point of order?

Mr. WALSH. I will make the point of order that this section carries an appropriation of $100,000. This committee is not authorized to report a bill carrying appropriations. It was appointed as the result of a special rule brought into the House in January of the current year. That rule reads as follows:

House resolution 216.

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to appoint a special committee of 18 Members to whom all bills and resolutions hereafter introduced during the Sixty-fifth Congress pertaining to the development or utilization of water power shall be referred (notwithstanding any general rule of the House to the contrary), except, however, bills and resolutions of which the Committee on Foreign Affairs has jurisdiction under the general rules of the House.

Then there is a further resolution discharging the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce from further consideration of four House bills and one Senate bill, and discharging the Committee on the Public Lands from further consideration of one House bill.

Mr. Chairman, the invariable rule is that a special committee appointed by the House does not obtain jurisdiction that may have been vested in one of the standing committees of the House, even though in creating the special committee you transfer to the standing committee measures which carry appropriations. Of course, the rules of the House set forth those committees that are authorized to report appropriations, and the Chair is familiar with the list of those committees among which is not mentioned any special committee or any committee that may hereafter be appointed. This committee was authorized to take over the consideration of the water-power bills, and when it was appointed it was expected to report out some comprehensive measure.

The committee held its hearings and has reported this bill, but the creation of that committee does not confer upon it authority to report out or to make any appropriation. This committee can recommend appropriations, but the Committee on Appropriations is the proper committee to carry appropriations for this project. Therefore, the provision in section 2 making the appropriation is clearly out of order.

Mr. ESCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I will.

Mr. ESCH. If the word "appropriate" in line 17 were changed to "authorize," would it meet the gentleman's objection? That would require the matter to go ultimately to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WALSH. I call the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin to the provision in lines 15 and 16 carrying the authorization for an appropriation, and it would not be necessary to carry a further authorization of the $100,000 in the same bill. If you put the general authorization in the bill there is no necessity for the further authorization of $100,000.

Mr. ESCH. We carried the thought of authorization against the appropriation in lines 15 and 16, but did make a direct appropriation in line 17, and so I suggest that in line 17 we change the word "appropriate" to "authorize."

Mr. TOWNER. You would have to amend in line 17 all of the language from the word "and," including "appropriate," in the end of the line if you desire to leave only an authorization.

Mr. ESCH. No; the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is authorized to make appropriations for lighthouse service and coast-guard service. In this instance we are merely authorizing the maximum to be expended and we do not appropriate that amount.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. If you read the language you will see, commencing in line 15, that it states:

> And in order to defray the expenses made necessary by the provisions of this act there is hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as Congress may hereafter determine.

If you desire to make the authorization of $100,000, or not exceeding that, you qualify that by language just as if the authorization had not been put into the section by saying the sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated. That is an absolute appropriation of money in just as distinct language as could be made.

Mr. FOSTER. If the gentleman will permit, the bills transferred to the special committee by order of the House carried appropriations. The House itself transferred its jurisdiction of those bills carrying appropriations to this special committee.

Mr. WALSH. The Interstate Commerce Committee had no jurisdiction to report this bill out with an appropriation under the rule.

Mr. FOSTER. I think, under the circumstances, there is no question but that this special committee has the jurisdiction, because the House transferred to it these bills carrying appropriations.

Mr. TOWNER. If that be true, then the language does not mean the conditions that arose, because it should be stated here that this is an authorization for an appropriation in accordance with the previous legislation.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. I think the gentleman is under a misapprehension as to the jurisdiction of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to appropriate money. We appropriated $500,000,000 as a revolving fund in the railroad bill. We have frequently appropriated money to execute the laws which we pass. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce had jurisdiction of what is known as the Shields bill, and that bill by order of the House transferred bodily to the special committee all jurisdiction of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, thereby giving jurisdiction to the special committee on these particular bills on water-power legislation and the appropriations necessary to carry it out. But, like the gentleman from Wisconsin, if there is any trouble about it, we can strike out the word "appropriate" and say "hereby authorized," and that would completely cure it. But I think it is all right as it is. It is the difference between tweedledee and tweedledum.

Mr. WALSH. There has been a good deal of tweedledee and tweedledum about the progress of the bill, but there is no tweedledee and tweedledum about the point of order. The rules of the House specifically provide that unless the committee is authorized it can not report bills carrying appropriations. That authority with reference to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, as the gentleman knows, only gives that committee authority to appropriate for lighthouse bills and bills of that sort. The rulings of the presiding officers have held that. These bills that were introduced may have carried appropriations.

Mr. SIMS. I have stated that the committee appropriated $500,000,000 in the railroad bill.

Mr. WALSH. But no point of order was made against it.

Mr. SIMS. No.

Mr. WALSH. If there had been, it would have been held subject to a point of order. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce under the rule can not appropriate except for life-saving service and lighthouses. Those two appropriations for lighthouses and life-saving service the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce can appropriate for; but under clause 10, Rule XI, it has no authority to report out an appropriation. The farthest they can go is to report recommendations. The gentleman from Illinois suggests that because these bills as they were introduced carried appropriations and were referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, therefore the House transferred to that special committee authority to report out a bill carrying appropriations. That does not follow. They may have introduced a bill which was referred to any committee carrying an appropriation, but the committee would not be authorized to report the appropriation if we transferred it to some other committee simply because the bill contained that authority and was introduced. Can the gentleman draw from that action that we are vesting authority in a special committee to make appropriations? The unbroken custom of the House has been, in creating committees, giving them this tremendous authority to appropriate money out of the Public Treasury, that unless we specifically designate it they do not have the right to report appropriations. Most of these bills came from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. One of them came from the Committee on the Public Lands. No one would contend that in creating this committee under the language used in that special rule adopted last December that, either directly or by implication, we conferred any such authority. We have committees that are authorized to report appropriations, and they are as follows:

The Committees on Appropriations, Rivers and Harbors, Agriculture, Foreign Affairs, Military Affairs, Naval Affairs, the Post Office and Post Roads, Indian Affairs, Claims, War Claims, and Accounts to a limited extent. The Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee is not included in that list given in the Manual, and neither is the Committee on the Public Lands. But that is beside the question. The point here is that the House by a special rule created a new committee and gave it authority to consider certain matters that have been under consideration by other committees.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman a question. In the resolution to which he refers this very bill we are now considering, together with four or five other water-power bills, were taken away from various committees and referred to the Water Power Committee, which has under control this particular bill. If it should turn out that one or more of those bills referred to the Water Power Committee by this special resolution carried an appropriation, would that not, in effect, be a command from the House that this committee may consider or shall consider bills that do carry appropriations?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. WALSH. Oh, the Chair has asked me a question.

Mr. SIMS. I want to give the gentleman some information.

Mr. WALSH. And I want to give the Chair some information. May I direct the attention of the Chair to the fact that this particular bill that we are now considering is not a bill that was referred to that committee. The bill referred to the committee did not carry any appropriation. This is a substitute that the committee had prepared, and we are considering this as an original bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's statement is correct, because this bill we are considering is a substitute for Senate bill 1419; but the Chair does find in that bill, on page 19, some reference to an appropriation in this language:

> The charges and rents arising from such lease or leases are hereby reserved and appropriated as a special fund in the Treasury to be expended for the maintenance of said dams and the further improvement of waterways in which the same may be situated under the direction of the Secretary of War.

The Chair has not examined the other bills referred to this committee, but is informed that they do carry appropriations. The point the Chair is desirous to ask is whether, if these various bills did carry appropriations and did carry them at the time the latter was referred to this committee, that is not tantamount to authorizing this committee to report appropriations?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly not. Anyone can introduce a bill carrying an appropriation, and it might be referred to a committee that had authority to report out an appropriation bill, and the House might transfer it to some other committee. For instance, it could transfer this bill, if it had so desired, to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries. That committee has no authority to report out appropriations. Would the Chair hold that because some one introduced a bill which carried an appropriation and the House transferred it from one committee to some other committee that it thereby vested the authority in that particular body to make appropriations?

The CHAIRMAN. In reply to that the Chair desires to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that in Hinds' Precedents he finds the following (vol. 4, sec. 4352):

> The House itself may refer a bill or resolution to any committee, and jurisdiction is thereby conferred.

So that when the House refers a bill to a committee it may send it to any committee without regard to jurisdiction.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, jurisdiction to report it; but the House does not confer power that is not contained in the resolution of reference. You can not broaden a special rule, in violation of express rules of the House, unless you specifically mention it. That is what this committee has done. It has sought to broaden its authority under a special resolution passed by this House. The only thing that resolution did was to give the committee jurisdiction. An examination of measures heretofore introduced in the nature of water-power bills will show that almost universally they do not contain specific appropriations, such as are sought to be carried in this bill. Under the reading of the rules which the Chair quoted the Chair is perfectly correct.

You can take jurisdiction over a matter from one committee and confer it upon another committee, notwithstanding any rules to the contrary. That means that if we take a bill from the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee and give it to a Committee on Agriculture the Committee on Agriculture has a right to consider that bill, even though the rules of the House say that the subject matter of the bill is under the jurisdiction of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee. If the House takes a measure away from the Committee on the Judiciary, for instance, and gives it to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, then the House confers jurisdiction upon the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee to consider that bill, even though the rules say it ought to be considered by the Committee on the Judiciary; but that does not enlarge the power of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, and this resolution that was passed carried nothing that could in any way be construed to confer the right upon this special committee to report out an appropriation in the measure which it expected to report. As I said before, it is significant that the bills which were transferred carried no direct appropriation. The clause which the Chair read was not a direct appropriation out of the Treasury; it was a reservation, and a reservation of those receipts, and even that reservation as submitted would not confer jurisdiction upon the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee to appropriate them later. And I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the special committee has exceeded its authority under the resoluion creating it and under any rules and precedents in appropriating out an appropriation of $100,000.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, if the general rule advocated by the gentleman from Massachusetts is correct, no committee could report any bill which contained any provision which was not within the jurisdiction of that committee but was within the jurisdiction of some other committee of the House. Suppose, for instance, that a bill should be introduced covering two subject matters, one of which, if standing alone, would be within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Agriculture and another part of it belong to the jurisdiction of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. If the rule as contended for by the gentleman from Massachusetts is correct, the committee to which that bill was referred could only report a part of the bill, and that part which was specifically within its jurisdiction. The jurisdiction of committees is not limited in that way. When a bill has once been referred to a committee, even though it contains matter that is not within the jurisdiction of that committee and has been reported without objection, that matter is properly in the bill and properly before the House. The gentleman from Massachusetts is confused by the reversal of this proposition. In other words, it is generally true, of course, that an appropriating committee upon an appropriation bill can not report legislation, but it does not follow that because you can not carry legislation upon an appropriation bill that you can not, on the other hand, carry an appropriation on a purely legislative bill. I do not think the contention of the gentleman from Massachusetts is sound.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. If the gentleman is correct in his contention, an appropriating committee bringing in legislation on an appropriation bill which should happen to be referred to it by the House you could not raise the point of order against it?

Mr. ANDERSON. The rule specifically provides in that case, although a committee has power to appropriate and power to legislate, it can not carry legislation upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. WALSH. Well, the rule specifically provides in this case here the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has no jurisdiction over appropriations, although the words clearly imply that it may appropriate for——

Mr. ANDERSON. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has no jurisdiction over military affairs, and yet if a bill involving military affairs were referred to the committee, either originally or as a part of other legislation and was reported by that committee, it could not be stricken out, because it should have been referred, in the first place, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman state that the question of jurisdiction rests solely upon the form in which a bill is introduced?

Mr. ANDERSON. It is very frequently the result.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I call attention to the resolution creating this special committee, which reads as follows:

That the Speaker of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to appoint a special committee of 18 Members to whom all bills and resolutions hereafter introduced during the Sixty-fifth Congress pertaining to the development or utilization of water power shall be referred.

So, if a bill were introduced that had nothing to do with the development of water power more than simply making an appropriation to develop it, would it not come within the language of that resolution? All bills dealing with water power. It does not say bills which shall not contain appropriations, it does not say bills shall be limited in their extent, it does not say bills of a certain specified time, but it says "all bills," using the broadest language possible.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Surely.

Mr. WALSH. What would the gentleman say if none of these bills carried an appropriation?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I will answer the gentleman by asking a question: What would the gentleman think if this bill, instead of providing, as it does, for development by municipalities, by States, by individuals, by corporations, should, instead, provide simply and purely for development by the Government of the United States, making the necessary appropriation? Is there any doubt in the world that this appropriation would then be authorized by the language creating this committee?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly they would have authority to authorize but not to make.

Mr. DEMPSEY. It is not limited, it does not say——

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman does not distinguish between giving authority to authorize an appropriation and authority to make an appropriation. The rules of the House provide what committees can make appropriations.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Well, I know, but in this case the House can set aside its own rules and the House in this case did not limit this committee, but gave this committee authority over all water-power resolutions and bills of any and every kind without distinction, without reservation, without saying it should be limited so that they could not appropriate money; but in the broadest general possible terms and as I say you can very easily and very properly draw your conclusion by saying if there had been a bill or resolution for the Government itself undertaking to develop the water power and simply an amount of money appropriated to enable it to do that, then it would certainly come within this resolution.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Surely.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman take the position that the rules of the House must be construed strictly, but when by a special rule we create a special committee that then we must construe the resolution creating the committee broadly and liberally and read into it something that is not there?

Mr. DEMPSEY. No; I take the position that when you use the word "all," and do not limit it, that it means exactly what it says and should not be limited by the rules of the House when they are not referred to and do not in any way limit or attempt to limit it.

Mr. SIMS. This rule especially says:

Notwithstanding any general rule of the House to the contrary.

That is a part of the rule.

Mr. WALSH. What is the language?

Mr. SIMS. I will read it:

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to appoint a special committee of 18 Members to whom all bills and resolutions hereafter introduced during the Sixty-fifth Congress pertaining to the development or utilization of water power shall be referred—notwithstanding any general rule of the House to the contrary—except, however, bills and resolutions of which the Committee on Foreign Affairs has jurisdiction under the general rules of the House.

Mr. WALSH. That means any general rules of the House with regard to the reference of those bills, not with regard to other matters.

Mr. SIMS. I was just going to say that it, of course, would bear that construction, but has no power broad enough to abolish the general rule so far as these particular bills are concerned.

Mr. FERRIS. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the water-power bills emanating from the Committee on the Public Lands, that were introduced and were pending and were by this resolution formally referred to the Water Power Committee, did carry an appropriation and did carry a permanent appropriation, to wit, an appropriation of 50 per cent of the proceeds. We first authorized the Government to levy a tax for the use of the land for water-power development, and then appropriated 50 per cent for the use of roads and schoolhouses and 50 per cent into the reclamation fund itself, which is a revolving fund and is permanently established and goes on and on indefinitely.

If the question resolves into one as to whether or not the bill carries an appropriation, and it hinges on the question of fact, that question would be resolved in favor of the bill from the fact that the bill did carry affirmative appropriation. It may be $1,000,000 or $100,000,000, and may go on for one year or 100 years.

The CHAIRMAN. May I have the gentleman's attention? Will the gentleman from Oklahoma give the Chair the number of the bill to which he refers?

Mr. FERRIS. I think I have it right here.

Mr. WALSH. It is in the last resolution.

Mr. FERRIS. It is H. R. 7227, first session, Sixty-fifth Congress, and had in that same form practically passed the House twice before.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman from Oklahoma will not contend that if the Committee on the Public Lands reported that measure, and it was now under consideration, a point of order would not lie against the appropriation made?

Mr. FERRIS. I am not so sure about that. That has been tried here and adjudicated a good many times. And in the Oregon and California land grant cases we appropriated a very large sum. In fact, we appropriated something like $5,000,000.

Mr. WALSH. And it has also been adjudicated, when the point has been raised in other cases, that they did not have the authority to report bills carrying appropriations.

Mr. FERRIS. I dislike to inject myself into this argument as a sharpshooter on the rules, but I think there is something in what the gentleman says. I think it resolves itself into a question of whether or not it was done before the committee reported.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman have any doubt, this question notwithstanding, that as this measure authorizes the appropriation of such sums as Congress may from time to time determine the Committee on Appropriations will make appropriations?

Mr. FERRIS. I do not know about that. I do not think this is worth the time we spend upon it, because, as a matter of fact, probably this appropriation, and many more like it, will have to be provided for by the Appropriation Committee. I do not think it is vital; but, of course, the Chair wants to rule right since the question has been raised, and I repeat, if the Chair's opinion is hinging on a question of fact as to whether any of these bills did carry an appropriation, I will state that they did carry an appropriation, and they were referred to this committee by the House.

Let me add one word more, if I may: If this House by formal action should take the District bill, or the fortifications or the legislative bill, or any other appropriation bill, and send it to the Rules Committee or Public Lands Committee and direct them to act upon it, it is the action of the House and the committee would have the power to act. The House did that with reference to these bills. It formally referred them. This bill was pending. It carried an appropriation, and the appropriation was still in the bill, and it was pending in the committee.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield? I dislike to interrupt him, but I would like to know how the fact that the bill carried an appropriation when it was introduced makes any difference? How does the House know when the bill was to be reported it would carry an appropriation?

Mr. FERRIS. I can not think that the gentleman, with all his logic and learning on the rules, would carry through such logic as that. The House is presumed to know precisely what it did, and the thing it did was to formally direct this committee to report this bill, and this bill did carry an appropriation, and the Committee on Water Power has obeyed the summons and mandate of the House and is before you with the bill.

Mr. DEMPSEY. And is it not true that the bills were before the House and considered several times?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes; and they are well acquainted with the contents of them, and they have been formally referred.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I want to make an observation. I am quite sure that the chairman recognizes the importance of this proposition, because it is a very important one. The proposition involved is as to whether or not we shall follow the rules that have been universally followed with regard to the restriction and jurisdiction of our committees to make appropriations. It makes no difference what was contained in the bill, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] says. The point of order could have been raised at any stage of the proceedings against the consideration by any committee if it was not authorized to report appropriations. There is not any question whatever about that.

Now, gentlemen should understand that it is well settled, without any contrary opinion whatever, that only certain committees of the House have jurisdiction over appropriations, and only those. You can not by reference of a bill to a committee that is without jurisdiction as to appropriations thereby confer jurisdiction simply because the bill says "an appropriation." Still the question would be a question as to whether that committee could report an appropriation, because if it has not any jurisdiction it could not report and it would not have any right to take the bill before the House into its consideration.

Now, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has no jurisdiction as to appropriations, except in two instances, and the exceptions strengthen the rule. Those two are the Life-Saving Service and Lighthouses. This committee has no right to report a bill carrying an appropriation; or, rather, if they do report a bill carrying an appropriation they must recognize the fact that it is subject to a point of order, so far as the appropriation is concerned.

The committee that is now considering the matter has the right to authorize an appropriation, and certainly that is all the right it has; it can not make an appropriation. If gentlemen desire to do the thing that ought to be done, they will revise the language, so that it can be properly authorized, and not insist on making an appropriation.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, may I be heard just a moment, unless the Chair is ready to rule?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule; but if the gentleman desires to be heard the Chair will hear him.

Mr. RAKER. Never mind, then; I will not take the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is thoroughly convinced that the Committee on Water Power, which has control of this bill—Senate bill 1419—has no general power to appropriate money, and the Chair would hold so immediately if it were not for the exceptional circumstances under which this committee was created and these particular bills referred to it. Senate bill 1419, which was referred specifically to this new committee by the special resolution of the House, passed on January 11 of this year, does carry appropriations. It is stated that another bill referred to specifically in the resolution and referred to this special Committee on Water Power also carries appropriations.

The Chair confesses that this is a rather perplexing question, but it seems to the Chair that inasmuch as a special rule was provided by the Committee on Rules, after careful consideration, which was finally adopted and known as resolution 216, in which resolution these four bills were specifically named and specifically referred to the Committee on Water Power, it does seem to the Chair that the House must be assumed to have known what it was doing, and that it knew that these bills did carry some form of appropriation, and that the House thereby conferred on the committee in these particular instances, and in these alone, the power to make appropriations. Therefore the Chair rules that in these specific cases the committee has jurisdiction to make appropriations. That is as far as the Chair rules, except, as I said at the beginning, the Chair believes that this committee has no further power to make appropriations.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. RAKER offers the following amendment: After the word "appoint," in line 23, on page 33, strike out the words "an executive" and insert the word "a," so that it will read:

"SEC. 2. That the commission shall appoint a secretary."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California desire to be heard on the amendment?

Mr. RAKER. For just a minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized.

Mr. RAKER. The words there, "an executive secretary," are new, so far as legislation is concerned. You will find it in none of the acts creating secretaries of the various departments or Government establishments, and it is placed here for some purpose. It has some meaning. And this is the only meaning that we can find, and there is no doubt about it. From Words and Phrases Judicially Defined, volume 3, page 2568, I read the following:

Webster defines "executive" as qualifying for or pertaining to the execution of the law, as executive power or authority, executive duties. In government—executive is distinguished from legislative and judicial, legislative being applied to order or organs of government which make the laws, judicial to that which interprets and applies the laws, executive to that which carries them into effect.

And here is where it applies—

Now, there is no doubt that this executive secretary does not belong in this bill. It is placed here for the purpose of having him supersede, when he is appointed, the commission in effect. He is simply a ministerial officer of that commission, nothing more and nothing less, without any powers except what they tell him to do, as they fix his duties under the bill. To authorize the appointment of a man who shall then become an executive secretary of that body, to execute and enforce the law relating to water-power legislation, is fairly beyond the intent and purpose of this bill. We have already taken three of the Cabinet officers and made them a commission. Now we say we are going to create an executive secretary, who must be appointed by this commission, and after he is appointed we then authorize and allow him to direct the affairs of the commission. In other words, he is the man who is going to control and run the affairs of this commission.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WALSH. Of course he could not do all this if he were not executive secretary, could he?

Mr. RAKER. Any man that understood the meaning of the law would clearly realize that if he was simply a ministerial officer, appointed only to perform ministerial duties as directed by the commission, he would not do anything else. What is the meaning of the words "executive secretary"? He must have some power to execute the law, to execute the measures provided in this act.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. RAKER. I do.

Mr. WALSH. Suppose this commission goes ahead and confers power and authority upon him as the secretary, which they intended to do, if we leave in the words "executive secretary"?

Mr. RAKER. They can not do it; they are the commission, and under this law they execute this law. They make the rules and regulations and must execute them, by order of the commission itself; and one commissioner in Louisiana, and another in California, and another in Maine can not execute an order; they must meet and be together. The law permits them to make rules and regulations, and then the executive secretary, to enforce the law and carry out the rules and regulations, would determine when and where licenses should be granted; and you abdicate the function of the commission and give it to the secretary. That is the purpose, and the gentleman ought to know it if he does not. That is the intent of placing the word "executive" before the word "secretary."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment. It is of little importance whether we call the official a secretary or an executive secretary. If the commission desires to confer this authority on the secretary, they can do it; and we all know that somebody has got to do a whole lot of work in order to make the law effective. The three Cabinet officers, if they have not enough to do in their own departments, will have enough to do when we compel them to administer this comprehensive law relating to power plants and sites.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Does the gentleman recognize that in the original act submitted by the President it provided that the three Secretaries should appoint a secretary—nothing less and nothing more?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Then why do you want an executive secretary?

Mr. WALSH. Because I think it is intended that the executive secretary shall be the administrative officer through whom this commission will perform its functions.

Mr. RAKER. Then, why the necessity of a commission at all?

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman from Mississippi did not think there was any necessity for one. The gentleman said we do not carry any executive secretaries in any other branch of the Government.

Mr. RAKER. Not by law.

Mr. WALSH. We created the War Credits Board, providing for an executive secretary.

Mr. RAKER. Not in the law.

Mr. WALSH. I differ with the gentleman; it was in the law. We provided for the Treasury Department. It has an executive officer in one or two of its bureaus and several of the departments. The Department of Labor has an executive clerk in the Division of Conciliation, and then in several miscellaneous branches of the Government there are executive officers. But the thing I wanted to ask about was, What is the meaning of the words "The work of the commission shall, in so far as practicable, be performed by and through the Departments of War, Interior, and Agriculture, respectively." Can the gentleman give any information about that?

Mr. SIMS. The only view I have of it is that these instrumentalities all have engineers and experts, so to speak; that they should be used instead of building up an immense bureau and appointing all these people from the outside and adding them to the pay roll when we already have them on the pay roll.

Mr. WALSH. What is the need of the word "respectively"? If the gentleman from California wants to begin by eliminating words, that is a good one to eliminate.

Mr. SIMS. I will tell the gentleman what I think that means. If this project is in the forest reserve, then their experts and engineers will do the work, and the same with the Interior Department and the same with navigable rivers, for instance, in the War Department.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman could not interpret the language to mean that—that one member of the commission could administer the law, in so far as it related to forest reserves, contrary to the wishes of the other two.

Mr. SIMS. Oh, no; but in making surveys and things of that sort there is no use of putting all of the employees in the three departments to do the work, but it should be done in reference to the work in each department—water power on the public lands by the Interior Department and navigable rivers by the War Department.

Mr. WALSH. I want to ask the gentleman from California a question.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WALSH. I will yield if the gentleman will answer one that I am going to ask.

Mr. RAKER. I will if I can. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that in the original bill there was a provision for the appointment of an executive officer at a salary of $10,000 a year, to give some fellow a fat salary to run the business. The committee did not believe in that kind of work, and simply provided for a secretary. Then, after the bill had been lying there for three weeks or so, somebody in some way got this word "executive" put into the bill.

Mr. WALSH. If you strike out the word "executive" are you going to reduce the salary?

Mr. RAKER. We have already reduced it from $10,000 to $5,000.

Mr. WALSH. I know; but if you strike out the word "executive" are you going to reduce the salary still further?

Mr. RAKER. No.

Mr. WALSH. I do not think we ought to strike this word out.

Mr. ESCH. It was on my motion that the word "executive" was inserted in the bill. I stand for the bill as reported to the House by our committee. I was persuaded to reinsert the word "executive" before the word "secretary" because in the original draft of the bill, the sanctified draft which was delivered to Chairman Pou, of the Rules Committee, we used the words "executive officer." I want an executive secretary to distinguish him from the secretaries of the three Cabinet officers. That is the purpose of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from California to strike out, in line 23, on page 23, the words "an executive" and to insert the word "a."

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I think the inquiry made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] about the last part of section 2 is a very pertinent one. I do not know how far I can consistently object to parts of this bill, being a member of the committee, although I filed a minority report upon it which related to another matter than this. I think the inquiry of the gentleman from Massachusetts is one that ought to have some attention. In line 25, one page 23, I find this language:

> The work of the commission shall, in so far as practicable, be performed by and through the Departments of War, Interior, and Agriculture, respectively.

I think that will breed confusion. I think it will cause a seesawing and a pulling and hauling between those different departments that never ought to exist.

Mr. MADDEN. The word "respectively" ought to come out.

Mr. FERRIS. I think so. I think it will cause the Secretary of Agriculture to try to run with an iron hand the 365,000 acres under his jurisdiction. I think it might cause the Secretary of the Interior to rule with an iron hand the 700,000,000 acres of public lands under his jurisdiction. I think it might cause the Board of Army Engineers in the War Department to rule with an iron hand as to their schemes and to contend that the law contemplated that they should so rule with respect to their department.

Mr. MADDEN. They would not be able to coordinate.

Mr. FERRIS. I think that is true. So that a man presenting an application for a license or the modification of a license, or for any service of any sort, would never know when he was through dealing with the commission. I am not going to offer any amendment about it. It might not come in good form from me, but I think that change ought to be made, and if the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] will use the courage that he always has present with him, I would like to see him offer an amendment and take a vote of the House on that proposition.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Is not the whole theory of this bill that in the administration of this water-power proposition we shall have the joint action, the joint thought, and the joint experience of the three Secretaries?

Mr. FERRIS. Absolutely.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Are you not destroying the whole theory of the bill when you say "respectively"?

Mr. FERRIS. I confess it seems to me that way. I do not want to disrupt anything here, but I would like to see that language modified.

Mr. BURNETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BURNETT. It strikes me that that is a very proper function. If you do not have the word "respectively" in there, will not that mean that they have all got to cooperate together on the same thing?

Mr. FERRIS. I think that is the way it should be.

Mr. BURNETT. There are some things that are covered by the functions of one department and some by the functions of another department, and it seems to me the purpose of the word "respectively" is in order that there shall not be confusion of the very kind that the gentleman speaks of.

Mr. FERRIS. Let me reply to that for just a moment. Of course, I think the purpose of the bill is to have this subject covered under one comprehensive water-power policy, so that the applicant for a license or a modification of it will know where to go to, and will know where to go for the final word, and who is authorized to speak the final word. I think that in having a stool of three legs, if you must have the approval of each leg separately and respectively, you will never get anywhere. Personally I should like to see the action of that commission a single action, so that when action is taken, that will be the end of it. Our departments here are scattered all over town, and I do not know how other Members of the House have been impressed, but it certainly has been impressed on me when I go to transact a little business about the war or about the Navy or about any trivial thing that I start out in the morning and I wind up at night with some additional man yet to see. If this is intended to be a comprehensive measure—and I think it is, I think it is well conceived and well intended—we ought to make only one bite of a cherry.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Does not the gentleman think the reason that word "respectively" is put in there is because of the different functions of these three Secretaries? The Secretary of War has certain things to perform in connection with navigation, in connection with the rivers of the country, that the other two Secretaries have nothing to do with and should not have. This is put in there so that in certain cases he can go ahead without the other two having anything to do with the matter. I am satisfied it was put in there by the Secretaries because they felt it was necessary to have it in there.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Oklahoma be extended for four minutes.

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, I do not want that much time.

Mr. RAKER. Yes, the gentleman will to answer the question.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MADDEN. What is the point before the House?

The CHAIRMAN. There is nothing before the committee.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in line 2, page 24, the word "respectively."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the gentleman from Illinois can not take the gentleman from Oklahoma off his feet by a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts in order that he may offer his amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in line 2, page 24, the word "respectively" and substitute a period for the comma after the word "agriculture."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: Page 24, line 2, after the word "agriculture," strike out the comma and the word "respectively" and insert after the word "agriculture" a period.

Mr. WALSH. I now yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. FERRIS. And I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, in the original bill which the committee had before it there was a provision for an executive officer, whose salary was to be $10,000 a year. Then there was a further provision that the commission shall appoint a secretary, who shall receive a salary of $5,000 a year, and it shall have authority to employ and fix the compensation of such attorneys, special agents or examiners, clerks, and other employees as it may from time to time find necessary for the proper performance of their duties, and as may be from time to time appropriated for by Congress. It was discussed and considered that all three of these departments, respectively, had many attorneys, experts, and examiners that the commission could reach out at any time and go to the Department of the Interior and get some experts and examiners without saying anything about it to the other departments. They could then go to the Department of Agriculture and do the same thing, and also go to the Department of War. That provision was put in there so that the commission could order from each department as it wanted them these various competent men now in the departments and avoid the provision in the bill which gave them the right to get all of the expert attorneys and assistants they wanted. The word "respectively" ought to remain there, because you should not go to all of these departments at once. If you have an expert irrigation engineer in the Department of Agriculture, the commission may order that that engineer be sent to them, and he is brought there under this law and nothing else, and I call the gentleman's attention particularly to the fact that that was one of the matters in which we thought we were saving the Government expense, in changing it from the original bill to the way it is now, allowing the commission provided for in this act to go to any one of these departments respectively, to any two of them, whenever it wanted to get these people.

Mr. FERRIS. All I have to say about that is, that I do not think the gentleman's remedy will cure the disease of which he complains, and if the committee moved from that cause, I think they moved from a wrong premise, and convinced against my will I will be of the same opinion still.

Mr. MADDEN. I think they used unhappy language to express the thought the gentleman from California tried to convey to the House.

Mr. FERRIS. My own idea is if we are going to coordinate these three branches it will be necessary to draw them together in a compact whole and make one efficient bureau out of it and get rid of those that are of no account, if any there be. We should pick out the good men to handle this thing, and make a comprehensive project out of it. I do not want to take up any more time.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, if the idea conveyed by the remarks of the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] was the impelling logic which was followed by this special committee in framing this legislation, there was no need of creating a commission. All you had to do was to start this measure with the second sentence in section 2 and say that the work required by this act shall be performed by and through these departments, respectively.

Mr. FERRIS. And they all do that now.

Mr. WALSH. We have appointed the heads of these three departments as a commission, and they have a separate entity when they sit as that commission. If they have work done by the Department of Agriculture, it is not done as the Department of Agriculture, but it is done as this commission, and the Department of Agriculture will assign one of its experts to this commission.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. There is no doubt on earth that if anyone reads this bill, if he has any other mind upon it, he has entirely misconceived the purpose of it. We have appointed a commission, and the mere fact that these three men are respectively the Cabinet officers and the Secretaries of the three departments does not affect their powers as commissioners under this bill, and the provision was inserted that they may go to these various departments and get their assistants.

Mr. WALSH. Well, I can not agree with the gentleman. Now, the gentleman says it does not affect their powers as Cabinet officers. I submit that under the authority given this commission in this bill the Secretary of Agriculture, as the executive head of that department, can not block a project upon which the other two commissioners have agreed.

Mr. RAKER. Why, it requires a vote of two of them.

Mr. WALSH. Surely; two.

Mr. RAKER. And one can not defeat it.

Mr. WALSH. The Department of War and the Department of the Interior can adopt a project even if the Secretary of Agriculture, as the executive head of that department, is in the minority and against it.

Mr. RAKER. Its only purpose is that all of the various officers of these departments may be called upon whenever the commission wants them for the purpose of assisting in the work and nothing else.

Mr. WALSH. If the language read something like this, I submit that the gentleman might have the correct idea:

The work to be performed by the commission shall be, so far as practical, performed by and through the Department of War—

And so forth.

But this says, "the work of the commission." Now, that means, as I understand it, that the work to be done by this commission consisting of these three executive heads shall be performed as far as practical by those three departments.

Mr. RAKER. Not at all.

Mr. WALSH. Not respectively, but by those three departments.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMALL rose.

Mr. SIMS. As we expect to rise to take up the conference report at 4 o'clock, I want to ask that debate on this amendment cease, say, in five minutes.

Mr. SMALL. Five minutes will be sufficient for me.

Mr. WALSH. Does not the gentleman think that he ought to reserve a little of that time for himself in order that he might propose a substitute if he thinks it necessary to meet his views?

Mr. SIMS. I do not care to use any time myself, and I will withdraw the request, as the gentleman seems to oppose it.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute amendment for the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute amendment offered by Mr. SMALL: Page 23, line 25, after the word "the," strike out the word "work" and insert "conclusions and orders"; also, page 24, line 1, after "practicable," insert the words "and appropriate."

Mr. SMALL. Now, Mr. Chairman, if I may have the attention of the gentleman, if the substitute is adopted it will read in this manner:

The conclusions and orders of the commission shall, in so far as practicable and appropriate, be performed by and through the Departments of War, Interior, and Secretary of Agriculture, respectively.

Mr. WALSH. You do not perform a conclusion. It seems to me that language is not appropriate.

Mr. SMALL. Well, there is something in the suggestion, and I ask unanimous nonsent to strike out the word "conclusions" and just leave it "orders."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman modifies his amendment in the manner stated.

There was no objection.

Mr. SMALL. Now, Mr. Chairman, the objection to this language as it appears has been based upon the fear that the executive or administrative powers of the commission given by this bill will be relegated, respectively, to the Departments of War, Interior, and Agriculture. Now, the purpose of the language was apparently otherwise. It was intended that these respective departments, with the organization and the machinery which they possess, should carry out the orders of the commission, and that is necessary. It makes the work of the commission easier. It is more economical. In the War Department they have the service of Army engineers particularly to call upon who have under the law jurisdiction over the improvement of navigable waterways and the construction of dams, and in the Interior Department they have jurisdiction of public lands; in the Agricultural Department, public reservations. So that this substitute makes more clear the purpose of the original language, and that is to say, in the interest of economy and good administration, to authorize the commission to call upon these three departments as might be proper to carry out their orders.

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman think the word "conclusions" there——

Mr. SMALL. That has been stricken out so it is simply "orders."

Mr. SIMS. That is all right.

Mr. SMALL. So that, Mr. Chairman, the substitute would then read as follows:

The orders of the commission shall, in so far as practicable and appropriate, be performed by and through the Departments of War, Interior, and Agriculture, respectively.

This seems to me to carry out in clear and unmistakable language the intent of the original clause, and, in addition, it appears to me to be good legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to call the attention of the committee to the unanimous-consent agreement which was agreed to some time ago that at 4 o'clock the committee will rise for the purpose of considering the conference report on the man-power bill.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that a vote be taken on this amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, I do not think we are ready to take this vote yet. I am of the opinion gentlemen do not really understand the purpose of this language and I want to see if I can not introduce an idea that does not seem to have been grasped here at all. The gentleman from North Carolina suggests the use of the word "orders." It is not to do work after an order is passed. These three departments now have control, one of the forest reserves, the other of public lands, and the Secretary of War of navigation. Now, if there is a question of a water-power project coming up in either one of those departments it does not mean the other two Secretaries are going to yield any right to pass opinion finally, but it means that the work connected with the investigation shall be done by those respective departments which have their officials and their labor ready to look after that department.

It simplifies the matter. It reduces the expense, and I do not think complicates anything. I think that is the significance of the language the gentleman seeks to strike out.

Mr. SMALL. I insist that the word "orders" there is better than the word "work," because "work" might imply substitution for the commission.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is immaterial to me as to the words other than to have the idea maintained. The real object, I think, is to allow the different departments to look after the questions properly belonging to their respective jurisdictions.

Mr. SMALL. I think that is all right, but I think the word "orders" is better than "work."

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, let us have a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WALSH. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 13, noes 31.

So the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. RAKER. Just a moment.

Mr. SIMS. I will have to move to rise.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the gentleman has no right to interrupt the vote by a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can make a parliamentary inquiry. He will state it.

Mr. RAKER. Under the unanimous consent, has all time been exhausted upon this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It has.

The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

The question was taken, and the Chair reported that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. RAKER. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 26, noes 12.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. KITCHIN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. WEBB, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill S. 1419, the water-power bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

CHANGES OF DRAFT AGE.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I submit a conference report on the bill H. R. 12731, the draft bill, and ask that it be considered under the special order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk reported the conference report and statement, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 736).

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate insert the following:

"That the second sentence of section 2 of the act entitled 'An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States,' approved May 18, 1917, as amended, be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"'Such draft as herein provided shall be based upon liability to military service of all male citizens and male persons residing in the United States, not alien enemies, who have declared their intention to become citizens, between the ages of 18 and 45, both inclusive, and shall take place and be maintained under such regulations as the President may prescribe not inconsistent with the terms of this act: Provided, That the President may draft such persons liable to military service in such sequence of ages and at such time or times as he may prescribe: Provided further, That a citizen or subject of a country neutral in the present war who has declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States shall be relieved from liability to military service upon his making a declaration, in accordance with such regulations as the President may prescribe, withdrawing his intention to become a citizen of the United States, which shall operate and be held to cancel his declaration of intention to become an American citizen, and he shall forever be debarred from becoming a citizen of the United States.'

"SEC. 2. That the provision wherever occurring in section 4 of said act, 'persons engaged in industries, including agriculture, found to be necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment or the effective operation of the military forces or the maintenance of national interest during the emergency,' be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"'Persons engaged in industries, occupations, or employments, including agriculture, found to be necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment or the effective operation of the military forces or the maintenance of national interest during the emergency.'

"SEC. 3. That section 5 of said act be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"That all male persons between the ages of 18 and 45, both inclusive, shall be subject to registration in accordance with regulations to be prescribed by the President, and, upon proclamation by the President or other public notice given by him or by his direction stating the time or times and place or places of any such registration, it shall be the duty of all persons of the designated ages, except officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army; officers and enlisted men of the National Guard while in the service of the United States; officers of the Officers' Reserve Corps and enlisted men in the Enlisted Reserve Corps while in the service of the United States; officers and enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps; officers and enlisted and enrolled men of the Naval Reserve Force and Marine Corps Reserve while in the service of the United States; officers commissioned in the Army of the United States under the provisions of this act; persons who, prior to any day set for registration by the President hereunder, have registered under the terms of this act or under the terms of the resolution entitled 'Joint resolution providing for the registration for military service of all male persons citizens of the United States and all male persons residing in the United States who have, since the 5th day of June, 1917, and on or before the day set for the registration by proclamation by the President, attained the age of 21 years, in accordance with such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe under the terms of the act approved May 18, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States,'" approved May 20, 1918, whether called for service or not, and diplomatic representatives, technical attachés of foreign embassies and legations, consuls general, consuls, vice consuls, and consular agents of foreign countries, residing in the United States, who are not citizens of the United States to present themselves for and submit to registration under the provisions of this act; and every such person shall be deemed to have notice of the requirements of this act upon the publication of any such proclamation or any such other public notice as aforesaid given by the President or by his direction; and any person who shall willfully fail or refuse to present himself for registration or to submit thereto as herein provided shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall, upon conviction in a district court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year and shall thereupon be duly registered: Provided, That in the call of the docket precedence shall be given, in courts trying the same, to the trial of criminal proceedings under this act: Provided further, That persons shall be subject to registration as herein provided who shall have attained their eighteenth birthday and who shall not have attained their forty-sixth birthday on or before the day set for the registration in any such proclamation by the President or any such other public notice given by him or by his direction, and all persons so registered shall be and remain subject to draft into the forces hereby authorized unless exempted or excused therefrom as in this act provided: Provided further, That the President may at such intervals as he may desire from time to time require all male persons who have attained the age of 18 years since the last preceding date of registration and on or before the next date set for registration by proclamation by the President, except such persons as are exempt from registration hereunder, to register in the same manner and subject to the same requirements and liabilities as those previously registered under the terms hereof: And provided further, That in the case of temporary absence from actual place of legal residence of any person liable to registration as provided herein, such registration may be made by mail under regulations to be prescribed by the President: And provided further, That men registered under the provisions of this act who have served in the Navy of the United States shall, upon their own application, be permitted to reenlist in the naval or marine service of the United States with and by the approval of the Secretary of the Navy.

"SEC. 4. That all men rendered available for induction into the military service of the United States through registration or draft heretofore or hereafter made pursuant to law, shall be liable to service in the Army or the Navy or the Marine Corps, and shall be allotted to the Army, the Navy, and the Marine Corps under regulations to be prescribed by the President: Provided, That all persons drafted and allotted to the Navy or the Marine Corps in pursuance hereof shall, from the date of allotment, be subject to the laws and regulations governing the Navy and the Marine Corps, respectively.

"SEC. 5. That the wife of a soldier or sailor serving in the present war shall not be disqualified for any position or appointment under the Government because she is a married women.

"SEC. 6. That soldiers, during the present emergency, regardless of age and existing law and regulations, shall be eligible to receive commissions in the Army of the United States. They shall likewise be eligible to officers' schools under such rules and regulations as may be adopted for entrance to such schools, but shall not be barred therefrom or discriminated against on account of age.

"SEC. 7. That the Secretary of War is authorized to assign to educational institutions, for special and technical training, soldiers who enter the military service under the provisions of this act in such numbers and under such regulations as he may prescribe; and is authorized to contract with such educational institutions for the subsistence, quarters, and military and academic instruction of such soldiers.

"SEC. 8. That any person, under the age of 21, who has served or shall hereafter serve in the Army of the United States during the present emergency, shall be entitled to the same rights under the homestead and other land and mineral entry laws, general or special, as those over 21 years of age now possess under said laws: Provided, That any requirements as to establishment of residence within a limited time shall be suspended as to entry by such person until six months after his discharge from military service: Provided further, That applications for entry may be verified before any officer in the United States, or any foreign country, authorized to administer oaths by the laws of the State or Territory in which the land may be situated.

"SEC. 9. That hereafter uniforms, accouterments, and equipment shall, upon the request of any officer of the Army or cadet at the Military Academy, be furnished by the Government at cost, subject to such restrictions and regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe."

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill H. R. 12731, "Amending the act entitled 'An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States,' approved May 18, 1917," submit the following written statement explaining the effect of the action agreed on:

The House receded on the proviso in the first section, to the effect that a citizen of a neutral country who has declared his intention shall be relieved from liability to service by withdrawing his declaration, which shall forever debar him from becoming a citizen of the United States.

The House receded upon its amendment known as section 2, which undertook to provide for the military service of citizens or subjects of cobelligerents residing in the United States. This provision was opposed by both the State and War Departments.

Section 3 of the House bill, made section 2 of the conference report, which relates to exemptions on account of occupations and employments, including agriculture, does not materially change the language used in the House bill. It is a mere transposition of language, and as the Senate bill was one entire amendment to the House bill the language of the Senate was adopted.

The Senate receded from the proviso known as the "work-or-fight" provision of the bill.

The Senate receded from the provision authorizing the wearing of some suitable badge, insignia, or uniform by exempted persons.

The Senate receded from the proviso authorizing local boards to designate the deferment or exemption of registrants rather than for the claim to be made by the registrant himself.

The Senate receded from its provision authorizing the appointment of nonresidents as members of local boards.

The House accepted the language of the Senate provision specifying the exception of persons who are not required to register. It was stated by Gen. Crowder that this specific statement of exceptions was made for the benefit of the administration of the law, and that it meant no more nor less than that officers or enlisted men in the service of the United States, either in the Army or the Navy, should not be compelled to register, as far as citizens of this country are concerned. It also excepts diplomatic representatives, technical attachés of foreign embassies and legations, consuls general, consuls, vice consuls, and consular agents of foreign countries residing in the United States who are not citizens of the United States. Under the law, otherwise, registration of all persons in this country, except alien enemies, is required.

The House accepted the Senate provision providing for the induction of male citizens liable to service under this act in either the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the President.

The conferees agreed upon the general provisions of the House bill, authorizing the appointment of registrants between 18 and 21 as officers, but extended the language so as to make eligible all soldiers regardless of age.

The Senate receded from its provision as to the education of drafted persons after the conclusion of the war, but accepted the House provision, known as section 8, authorizing the Secretary of War to assign soldiers to educational institutions for special and technical training. It was agreed to strike out, however, the paragraph providing an appropriation, in view of the fact that in order to carry this act into effect it will be necessary to have a deficiency appropriation.

The House yielded to the Senate provision authorizing soldiers under 21 to take advantage of the homestead laws.

The House yielded to the Senate provision for officers' uniforms at cost, with some slight change in the phraseology, but struck out the provision making this applicable to the Navy. Under this provision, the Government, upon the request of an officer, must furnish the uniform at cost, subject to such restrictions and regulations as may be made by the Secretary of War.

In order to emphasize the situation, it may be repeated that the Senate accepted the House bill by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting their bill as one entire amendment.

S. H. DENT, Jr.,
W. J. FIELDS,
JULIUS KAHN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, if the House listened, and it apparently did, to the statement that has just been read, that absolutely states the whole case of the agreement between the conferees on the part of the two Houses. And unless some gentleman desires to ask questions in regard to it, it seems to me it is not necessary to continue the discussion.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. CALDWELL. I will ask the chairman to state to the House whether or not he has the order of the President discharging men who have their first papers from the Army, who are already in, and if this provision as adopted conforms to the order of the President?

Mr. DENT. Is the gentleman referring to the provision in regard to the registration of subjects of cobelligerent countries?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. DENT. I have the order from the President, which I will insert in the RECORD, and which was handed to me to-day while the conferees were in session, relative to the question of taking subjects of cobelligerents and neutral nations in this country. I had known for some time that the President had individually authorized the discharge of subjects of neutral countries whenever a claim was made by a representative of a country in behalf of the discharge from the Army, but I did not know that the order of the President had gone so far. I ask that this be read from the Clerk's desk. It is the official order of the President on the subject, and that is the reason that the conferees finally yielded on the McCulloch amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, 11 April, 1918.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Returning again to the question of aliens drafted into the military service of the United States, I have felt obliged to decide in the interest of international good feeling and for the preservation of the good faith of the United States in all matters of international obligation that—

I. That both declarants and nondeclarants of treaty countries shall in all cases be promptly discharged, upon request of the accredited diplomatic representatives of the countries of which they are citizens.

II. That nondeclarants of nontreaty countries shall be promptly discharged upon the request of the Secretary of State, and also when the War Department is satisfied that a discharge should be granted in cases where a full and fair hearing has not been given by the local board.

I have had the pleasure of explaining to you orally why I have felt constrained to come to these decisions.

Faithfully, yours,

(Signed) WOODROW WILSON.

The ACTING SECRETARY OF WAR.

Mr. NORTON, Mr. McCULLOCH, and Mr. STEENERSON rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON].

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I am very much interested in section 8 of the bill as agreed to by the conferees, which provides:

That any person under the age of 21 who has served or who shall hereafter serve in the Army of the United States, during the present emergency, shall be entitled to the same right under the homestead and other land and mineral entry laws, general or special, as those over 21 years of age now possess under said laws.

I think that is a very good provision, but there is at the end of that paragraph this very dangerous and objectionable proviso:

That applications for entry may be verified before any officer in the United States, or any foreign country, authorized to administer oaths by the laws of the State or Territory in which the land may be situated.

I have wondered if the conferees really considered the broad effect of that provision.

As I read it, it will permit any American soldier in the United States or in a foreign country to make an entry upon Government land, and it does not require any residence on his part on the land until after the war. It occurs to me that it will result in the entry, almost at once, of practically all of the Government land in the United States. It will give opportunity for tying up Government land by other than bona fide entries. It will invite, it seems to me, widespread fraud in public-land States.

I understand that this is a provision that has been advocated by many speculators and land attorneys in the West, but I believe it is a provision that ought not to be permitted to be enacted into the law. I am personally very much in favor of giving homestead lands to those in the Army who have shown a disposition to become homestead entrymen and who have thought of the matter, but I do not believe in opening the gates wide to permit every soldier from New York, Chicago, and other of the large cities of the country to tie up the public lands when they have no intention of becoming actual homestead settlers and never had any such intention.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORTON. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNER. It occurs to me that the gentleman's fears are hardly well grounded. The gentleman well knows that the language is, "Applications for entry may be verified before any officer." It has reference only to the form of the verification. It would only allow a soldier, in order to make an affidavit, to make it in the form prescribed by the law. It would not by any means relieve the applicant from the necessity of conforming to all the other provisions of the law, so far as his application and right are concerned.

Mr. NORTON. In making that statement the gentleman should take into consideration the fact that under existing laws these applications must be made and sworn to in the district where the land is entered upon.

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; it does away with that, because it allows the verification to be made there. But that refers only to the form of making the verification. It allows the soldier to do that under the forms that exist in his own State. It does away with the necessity of making the verifications in the place where the land is situated. That is true. It does do that. But it does not do away with the other requirements of the law.

Mr. NORTON. Let me call the attention of the House to this fact, that this provision not only permits but invites, where there are at the present time large tracts of Government lands, as in New Mexico, Arizona, and the Dakotas, any designing person to interest himself in having applications to enter land sent to soldiers in Europe, and have them make affidavits of entry, and have them return those applications to that designing person, who will file them in the local land office, thereby tying up large tracts of land through the agency of boys and young men who have never thought of becoming homestead entrymen, and depriving men who may come to that section of the country, and who really desire to become actual homestead settlers, of the opportunity of entering upon that land.

Mr. TOWNER. That is very true, I assume, in a sense, but you could not allow a soldier who was in France to make application for an entry unless that were proved. In other words, the gentleman, in opposing that proposition, would not give to the soldiers in France any right of making an entry while they were there?

Mr. NORTON. No. I must say to the gentleman that I believe that the only soldier who should be given the right to enter a homestead is one who, before he went into the Army, had shown an interest in taking a homestead and that his rights then should be protected.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I think I have the floor. I yielded to the gentleman from North Dakota only to ask a question.

Mr. NORTON. I wanted to ask the gentleman whether the conferees had really taken into consideration the wide effect of that provision? I believe it should be stricken out.

Mr. DENT. I confess to the gentleman that this is a provision that was put on in the Senate. The conferees did not go into details, but the conferees agreed generally to the idea that the boy who was going to be drafted into the Army should have the right to make an entry.

Mr. NORTON. And that his rights should be protected?

Mr. DENT. Let me finish. And if there is anything about the general administration of the law hereafter that needs attention, Congress can take care of it. But the general proposition ought to be incorporated in this bill, that if you make a boy fight you should give him all the privileges of a man.

Mr. McCULLOCH and Mr. FERRIS rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. DENT. I promised to yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS].

Mr. FERRIS. Of course, everyone wants to do everything that he can for the American soldier who goes out to defend the country, and if the land could really go to these soldiers I do not believe there is any better purpose that it could be put to. We are all so proud and appreciative of them and their efforts that nothing we could do would be enough. However, I can not help having some fears along the line suggested by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON] as to that last proviso of the amendment. I can not help believing that this amendment will make the soldiers and the public lands both just fat geese for the claim attorneys and the speculators, to speculate upon the credulity of the soldiers and use the remaining public land as a medium for their own selfish purposes. Of course, I do not want to obstruct anything connected with this bill or to say anything that will obstruct; but this legislation I am sure, could not pass if it stood alone, and I do not believe it would be advisable to let it pass in its present form. That is the danger always, of course, in allowing a foreign amendment to creep in on a bill that has to be put through to take care of some emergency. Probably there will be some 5,000,000 soldiers in the war before it is over. If each of them, through the instrumentality of a claim attorney, were to file an application for 640 acres of land, of course, there would be 3,200,000,000 acres of land required to meet the applications of the soldiers alone, which is more than four times as much public lands as we have. I do not believe even the soldiers would want this done, and I am fearful that this is doing something we ought not to do. But perhaps we can pass some supplemental act preventing, prescribing, and circumscribing the action of claim attorneys, who will at once get busy on this. If that can be done, I certainly do not want to throw a straw in the path of our soldiers. I am so afraid it is not for them; I am so afraid it will not benefit them in its present form. I will do anything I can to help them, but, of course, the public domain should not be frittered away to claim attorneys so there will be nothing left for the soldiers when they return.

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. DENT. Is the gentleman opposed to the general proposition?

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, no; I am not. I would be in favor of every soldier who serves through this war having carte blanche the right to make application for entries on the public land. Give it to him; help him; do anything to help him; but it would do him more good when he comes back than to give it to him now and let him sell it, relinquish, waste it, and dispose of it before he gets back.

Mr. DENT. I was sure when I asked the question that the gentleman was not opposed to the general proposition; and I want to ask the gentleman, who is chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, if he does not think that committee can take care of any defects that may arise in the administration of this law?

Mr. FERRIS. I think the Interior Department and the Commissioner of the General Land Office, who have to do with the administration of the public lands, ought to be immediately conferred with for the purpose of preparing and passing some legislation very quickly, to see to it that these boys are not presumed upon and that their credulity is not levied upon, and the public lands gobbled up by attorneys who are really not entitled to them.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I just want to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands to the fact that it does not seem to me that this authorization to have soldiers' homestead applications taken and sworn to before their commanding officers, wherever they may be located, will have the effect of waiving the other provisions of the homestead law, which require that before a person can file a homestead entry he must have previous personal knowledge of the land. As the chairman of the committee will recall, the applicant must state in his application that he is acquainted with each and every subdivision of the land, and that must be corroborated by two witnesses who have knowledge of the land. With those requirements in the existing law, does the gentleman think this provision allowing them to make application before their commanding officer and to make selection of the land will lead to any fraud upon the Government?

Mr. FERRIS. If the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs will allow me——

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman to answer the question.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman from Colorado has very extensive information on this subject, and I think it is very possible that through that provision they may be able to control this thing. But the gentleman lives in the West and so do I, and the gentleman knows that this will be a pretty fat pasture for the claim attorneys who will at once get into communication with the soldiers and try to have them file entries on these lands, and with the multitude of applications there will be opportunity for some frauds. It is possible, however, that the administrative officers can force them to declare that they are familiar with the land, and when they are unable to make that declaration then they can reject the entry.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. They undoubtedly would reject the entry unless the applicant complied with the provisions of the affidavit, requiring that the applicant have personal knowledge of every subdivision of the land.

Mr. FERRIS. Unless there is something in this that relieves them of that on the ground of impossibility, that might cover it sufficiently. But how can a man serving in France have familiarity with land in Colorado?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. If a boy has lived in a certain neighborhood in Colorado and has grown up with the land, and has had his eye on it, and the opportunity comes to him when he is 18 or 19 years of age instead of 21 years of age, to file upon that land, would it not be right for him to subscribe to the affidavit?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes; that would be all right; but I think it will not work out in that way.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. FERRIS. I do not feel that I ought to hold the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman from North Dakota for the purpose of asking a question.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TIMBERLAKE] has been a receiver or a register of a United States land office.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. A receiver.

Mr. NORTON. And he knows that the provision he mentions there is not complied with in the West, that in a contest action it is not held as a ground for setting aside the entry if the entryman has never seen the land.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I beg leave to differ very materially from the gentleman. In the office over which I presided that provision was violated to make the entry subject to contest.

Mr. NORTON. It has never been held as a ground for setting aside an entry.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I call attention to the fact that this simply affords this right to those who are not yet 21 years of age the same right that those who are now of age have. It defers their residence, or the establishment of residence, for six months after they return from the service, and then it simply authorizes the affidavit upon the application to be made before any officer of the United States or any State officer or in any foreign country before anyone who is authorized by the laws of the State or of the Territory in which the land may be situated. Several laws have been passed in the last two years that tend to do away with the land shark. It is a felony for a man to misrepresent through another the character of the land he is trying to file upon, and I think the conference committee has wisely permitted this to remain in the bill, permitting these boys to select the land now. They know it. Many of them have been over the land before they left home, boys 18 and 19 and 20 years of age. Their land will be retained and held for them, and they know as much about it as a man of age upon the ground, and if there is any possible chance for the land shark or the land grabber or the man who is holding out false advertisements we can amend the law to make it a State-prison offense, because practically everything for the last two years has been taken away from these people, and they must deal fair and square with the man who is trying to get a piece of land.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I want to ask if there is anybody who can answer this question: Take the case of a soldier under 21 years of age who has never seen the land that he intends to file on and who is now serving in France; can he execute the proper application for homestead entry and have his rights protected on the land that he seeks to gain possession of?

Mr. DENT. I will state that of course he could not do it if he has no information upon the subject; but he will have the right to do it and he will have the opportunity to have some friend give him the information. The whole proposition, to my mind, as I stated a little while ago, was that if you are going to make boys fight between the ages of 18 and 21 you ought to give them the same rights that you give the man who is 21, and that is all this does.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I am receiving a number of requests asking if a soldier will have the opportunity of filing on land located in the western part of the United States without going there and seeing it, while he is serving in the Army.

Mr. DENT. He is not given any authority in this act, of course. It may be that this legislation ought to be supplemented by other legislation, but what harm is there in giving this right now in this bill and then supplement the legislation later.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I am in favor of it; but I wanted to know if this produced the right effect.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Speaker, in regard to the making of application, if one will read the law he will find that it states that the applications of entrymen may be verified before any officer of the United States in a foreign country who is authorized to administer oaths by the laws of the State or Territory in which the land may be situated. Unless that officer has been authorized by the law of the State or the particular Territory he can not make that application.

Mr. DENT. That is true.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The matter is entirely protected in the law.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I want the attention of the House while I ask this question: Let us locate a soldier in Boston or in New York or in Chicago who has never been in a State where there is public land. Let us put him as a soldier in France. Does the gentleman claim or does any gentleman claim that a land agent, who sometimes is equivalent to a land shark, living anywhere in the West may go and look at that particular land and then for a fee enable the soldier that never saw the land to make his homestead claim?

Mr. DENT. Why, I state to the gentleman very frankly that I think this right given to the soldier should be supplemented by additional legislation.

Mr. CANNON. Then let us have additional legislation together, because if it opens the question, why then there must be legislation to modify it and I think the temper of the House would be that if a bill were passed to take care of the whole question that it will be much safer.

Mr. DENT. I agree with the gentleman's general proposition. The gentleman has been here longer than anybody else and he knows this was a Senate amendment. The general object is not objectionable and the gentleman knows that in order to get a bill you have to accept some things you would not otherwise accept.

Mr. GANDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. GANDY. The first part of this section provides that young men shall have the same privilege that those over 21 years of age now possess. Now, young men over 21 years of age do not now, under the law, have the privilege of filing a homestead entry after they go into the Army, so that only inferentially does this act give the young man under 21 the right to file after he has gone in, because the last proviso says that he may make an application and that that blank for entry may be verified before any officer, and so forth. Now, if the last proviso were not in, then the young man would be just in the same shape that those over 21 years are in, but I fear, although I may be wrong about this—I think I am not—that by this amendment we are putting young men under 21 in a class by themselves and authorizing them to do something that those over 21 do not now have the right to do.

Mr. DENT. Does the gentleman mean to say by that that the verification of the application is different under this?

Mr. GANDY. The young man over 21, under the law to-day, can not make a homestead application after he goes in the Army. He can complete one that he has already made. Now, by this last proviso you are authorizing the young man under 21 to do something that the young man over 21 can not do under the law to-day and you start out by saying——

Mr. DENT. I confess I do not see the point.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. RAKER. Where is the statute where a man who enters the service of the Army, drafted or volunteer, returning home on furlough can not make a homestead upon 160 acres of land that he has known ever since he was a boy?

Mr. GANDY. The gentleman must know that is all right if he can get home on a furlough.

Mr. RAKER. Exactly.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I want to ask the gentleman from South Dakota in what way he thinks this measure gives a privilege to a boy of 18 years of age more than that accorded to a man of 21 years of age?

Mr. GANDY. Inferentially it gives him the right to file away from home after he is in the Army.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. There has been a law on the statute books which was passed last year giving any homestead entryman the right to complete his homestead entry and make his affidavits before his commanding officer just the same as this, providing he is in the military or naval service of the United States.

Mr. GANDY. But the gentleman from Colorado is talking about the completion of an entry made before he went in.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. No, sir; he may have a contest already initiated before he went in——

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I think every one familiar with the public land laws and with the public domain realizes that it would be very unfortunate indeed if we should write into this law a provision under which, through land agents in all parts of the country and abroad, soldiers who never intend to make a home on a piece of Government land might make a filing and hold it during the entire time of their service, without cultivation, improvement, or settlement. That would not, in a majority of cases, be of any real benefit to the soldier and it would be very harmful to the western country.

No one, in my opinion, favors that sort of a proposition. On the other hand, I think we all agree that if we are to draft the boys below 21, thus placing them under all the obligations of manhood, we should grant them the same rights relative to public lands that men in the service of 21 and over have. The question is, do we accomplish that and do we avoid that which would be harmful by this provision. I regret that before this matter was agreed to some expert on the subject, like the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, was not consulted, because I think it would have been very easy indeed to have so modified the provision as to have made it very clear and definite.

My opinion is, however, that a fair construction of this provision would not give the soldier the right to make an entry without visiting the land and not after he had enlisted and gone into the service and obtained credit for residence, and that, therefore, there is not perhaps the danger of a deluge of entries that some fear. This provision is that those under 21 shall have the same rights as those over 21. Now, what rights under the homestead law and other land laws do soldiers now have? They have the right to make any affidavit that may be necessary after the entry is made, at home or abroad, before their officers. On the other hand, the law specifically provides that in order to secure the benefits of constructive residence the entry shall be initiated prior to the beginning of the service. Now, unless there shall be a construction of these provisions not justified by the language used, these men can not homestead unless they do so after going on the land and prior to their entry into the service.

Mr. FERRIS. What are you going to do with this proviso:

Provided further, That applications for entry may be verified before any officer in the United States or any foreign country authorized to administer oaths by the laws of the State or Territory in which the land may be situated.

I believe what the gentleman says is true, unless this takes it away.

Mr. MONDELL. That provision standing alone does not grant the right to make entry except after the necessary and usual preliminaries, and, in any event, gives no right of constructive residence, so far as it relates to affidavits related to an entry, after entry is made, it does have force and effect, but, in fact, that has already been provided for.

Mr. FERRIS. It says specifically, "Application for entry." Of course, that is the initial step in tying up a piece of land.

Mr. MONDELL. There is a law which came out of the gentleman's committee, and with which he is familiar, which provides that no credit for constructive residence shall be allowed on an entry made after the soldier goes into the service. Now, there is this possible difficulty: A liberal construction of this provision might hold that the soldier could make his entry after he got into the service. But clearly he would not be entitled to the benefit of the constructive residence, and therefore his entry would be of no value to him.

Mr. FERRIS. There is a proviso relieving him from that.

Mr. MONDELL. There is a proviso relieving him from the establishment of residence but not from continuing residence, but unless he first visits the land he can not enter.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yielded to the gentleman for a question, and he is making a very splendid exposition.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will give me about a minute more, I will conclude.

Mr. DENT. I regret we did not consult the experts on the public land laws, but I find they are as much in disagreement as anybody else, and I do not know that we would have accomplished anything if we had consulted them.

Mr. MONDELL. I think it is well to have an expression of opinion with regard to this matter before the conference report is adopted. I do not believe that the department could properly construe this bill in a way to allow entries by soldiers who had not visited the land, but unfortunately the language is not very clear, and in my opinion it ought to be cleared up by supplemental legislation. It is very certain we are not going now to vote against the gentleman's conference report in order to clear up the situation.

Mr. DENT. I agree with the gentleman it ought to be cleared up by supplemental legislation and handled by the Public Lands Committee.

Mr. McCULLOCH and Mr. STEENERSON rose.

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McCULLOCH].

Mr. McCULLOCH. The chairman of the committee will remember that yesterday I submitted to him in writing two suggestions of changes to be made in the alien-slacker amendment. One was that the amendment be made to apply to treaties that might be hereafter made or entered into by the United States with some foreign country, and I also suggested the addition of the provision that the President of the United States may at any time by Executive order suspend the operation of any of the provisions of the section as they relate to any of the cobelligerent countries if, in his opinion, the enforcement of such provisions would create any international complication. The chairman of the committee advised me the conferees have rejected not only the amendment but have rejected the two suggestions that I made. Now, will the chairman tell the House how the order issued by the President in May would conflict with this amendment should it be adopted and carry the language I have just read?

Mr. DENT. I will not undertake to say how it would conflict. I do not undertake to draw a comparison between that and the President's order.

But I will state to the gentleman from Ohio that the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS] and myself submitted his amendments to the conferees and insisted that certainly no harm could possibly be done if the amendments suggested by the gentleman from Ohio were adopted. We undertook as long as we could to get that provision upon the bill. The Senate conferees, however, were insistent against any proposition of that kind, because the State Department absolutely insisted that it ought not to be in this law. The War Department agreed that it ought not to be in this law. Gen. Crowder appeared to-day before the conferees, and I renewed the question and made a motion again to reconsider this proposition, and he said he hoped it would not be put in, and added that if the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio were adopted it would involve five Central and five South American Republics who are cobelligerents, but who themselves are not furnishing any single, solitary soldier to the army.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Did the gentleman point out the fact that the President might by an order immediately intervene and thus prevent any complications?

Mr. DENT. I did; and I think if we had adopted the amendment suggested by the gentleman, we would leave the situation exactly where it is, namely, in the hands of the President of the United States.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Why, then, was it not adopted?

Mr. DENT. What good could it accomplish?

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield me five minutes?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Speaker, I shall not undertake to discuss the merits of the proposal to draft aliens. The merits of that proposition have been discussed on the floor of this House, and this House has acted at least three times, indicating the temper of the Houe in regard to the proposition of drafting aliens. This House passed overwhelmingly the Burnett alien-slacker bill, which was strangled to death in another body.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCULLOCH. I will not yield.

Mr. GORDON. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. McCULLOCH. This House passed almost unanimously the amendment to the Army appropriation bill making effective treaties which the State Department claimed they were about to conclude. This House passed three days ago, by an overwhelming vote, the amendment which I proposed to this man-power bill drafting aliens. So that there can be no doubt in the mind of the chairman of the committee or anybody else as to the temper of this House on the proposition of drafting aliens.

Now, there are Members—and I am one of them—who would not for a minute want to support any amendment or any bill that would involve this country by its operation in international complications; neither would I want to vote for or see passed by this House a bill that would mean the violation of any treaty. I am one of those who believe that treaties should not be regarded as mere "scraps of paper." Yet I do want to say to the gentleman from Alabama that I want to see the Greeks and the Italians, fine physical specimens, in every way fit for military service, who appear on the streets of my home town all dressed up, some of them insulting women on the street, who are refusing to do even war work for less than 75 cents to a dollar an hour—I want to see them drafted and taken into the Army, and I want to see the Congress and the State Department stop temporizing with this most serious situation. [Applause.]

Now, the House of Representatives has done its part. Before I left Washington, at the time of the last recess, I called up the State Department and asked how soon the State Department could probably complete the treaties with Greece and Italy and with the other cobelligerent countries. I was told that by the time we got back here after the recess the treaties would be completed and sent to the Senate. When I got back here at the end of the recess I asked the State Department again about it and was told that it might be two months before they could work out the diplomatic differences with the Greek consul and get a treaty that would bring those Greeks who are of draft age into the Army. In my home county of Stark, in Ohio, it is estimated that there are 15,000 Greeks in that one county alone. I told the State Department that something ought to be done at once, that there had been one delay after another until everybody was losing patience as well as confidence, and I drafted this amendment. I wanted to see something done. I wanted to see results. A day or two afterwards I called the State Department again and was informed that they were about ready to have the treaty with Greece signed. Yet it is not signed as yet. These men are still not liable to service, and it is time that this House stood pat as against the Senate and the State Department in taking out of the bill this most important amendment. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, if I am given the opportunity, I propose to make a motion to recommit this bill and have it reported back forthwith, so that there will be no delay. I know that Members are reluctant to support a motion of that kind at this time, but I feel that it is my duty to make such a motion and your duty to support it, and I intend to do my duty as I see it.

The motion to recommit will carry my amendment with the suggested changes which I proposed to the gentleman from Alabama on yesterday, which if adopted will absolutely settle forever all question that any treaty might be violated, because by the express terms of the amendment itself no treaties can be violated and the act be operative. And further, there can be no international complications, because under the proviso I suggested the President of the United States could immediately issue an order making the provision ineffective against any countries where there would be any danger of complications.

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. McCULLOCH. Just a moment, until I finish this statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman one minute more. Has the attention of the gentleman been called to the fact that perhaps the amendment, if adopted, will not accomplish what the gentleman intends?

Mr. McCULLOCH. I intend by my amendment that aliens shall be drafted into the military service.

Mr. DENT. The gentleman's amendment provides that the subjects of cobelligerent countries shall not be exempt, instead of providing that the subjects of cobelligerent countries shall be liable to military service.

Mr. McCULLOCH. My amendment provides that they shall be liable to military service. The chairman of the committee is mistaken about that.

Mr. DENT. I may be, but I think the gentleman had better reread his amendment.

Mr. McCULLOCH. I do not need to reread it. I know what it provides, but for the information of the House I will read it all:

That no alien who is a citizen or subject of any of the countries cobelligerent with the United States in the present war shall, unless contrary to existing treaties or treaties hereafter concluded, be granted exemption from military service or placed in deferred classification under the provisions of this act or under any rule or regulation to be issued by authority granted under the provisions of this act solely on account of alienage: And provided further, That the War Department shall, immediately after the passage of this act, reclassify all aliens heretofore registered who are citizens or subjects of any of the countries cobelligerent with the United States in the present war, and who have been exempted or placed in deferred classification on account of alienage; and said aliens shall be called for service the same as citizens of the United States unless such action would be contrary to existing treaties or treaties hereafter concluded: Provided further, That the President of the United States may at any time, by Executive order, suspend the operation of any of the provisions of the foregoing section as they relate to any of the cobelligerent countries if in his opinion the enforcement of such provisions would create any international complications.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Will the gentleman yield me one more minute?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Now, this is what is happening in my home town and county: These aliens of cobelligerent countries are there by the thousands. They are physically fit and in every way qualified for military service, but they are claiming exemption solely on account of alienage, and they are going out onto the streets of my town and into the factories and bragging and claiming that they are specially favored by the United States Government. They are arrogant, and they refused in one instance to work for less than 75 cents an hour at common labor in loading war supplies to be sent to France to protect the health of our boys. They sit in the coffee houses, and, after working two or three days, they refuse to work any more. They sneer at our boys, their families, and friends, and say they will take the American boys' jobs, and they laugh at patriotism. It is all wrong; and I say that this House and this Congress should indicate clearly its attitude and not temporize with them any longer.

The Congress has spent a good part of a week deciding just how to reach every available source of man power in this great country. You take the American boy at the tender age of 18—and every American between the ages of 18 and 45 is held liable for military service—and if the future can be determined by what the past has been, they will all respond nobly and patriotically. But the Senate conferees say that the foreigner must not be taken, he must be specially favored. I tell you it is not right, and the delay in taking the alien is having a bad effect, and the longer the delay the worse it will get. I have this morning a letter which states the situation accurately and in a few words. A very prominent man in my district writes me as follows:

DEAR FRIEND McCULLOCH: I congratulate you on your victory in having aliens included in the man-power bill. There is nothing you have done in your public life that has met with quite the approval of your constituents as your fight for this American measure. I hear almost every day murmuring against the unfairness of taking our American boys and permitting the foreigners to enjoy our country and our freedom. In fact, these murmurings have cropped out in violence against foreigners who are reported to have said they were getting the good jobs now and the American women since the American men had gone to war. There was such an incident at Massillon, I learned, but it was not made public. Our parks are well filled on Sundays with foreigners of draft age, while the Americans are becoming scarcer and scarcer every day—and the latter are beginning to feel the unjustness of the situation.

If the Senate conferees had left my amendment in the bill drafting aliens, it would have made immediately available a source of man power estimated at near 2,000,000 men. There were 772,744 aliens of the cobelligerent countries registered at the first registration. If the alien would have to go, just as the American boy has to go, the number of American boys called would be very materially reduced. Less American boys would be taken from the farms. Less American boys would be taken from the schools. Less American boys would be taken from our industries. Why should there be a favored class, and above all why should it be the alien slacker class? If anyone is to be favored, let it be our own; but there should be no favored class anywhere.

The burdens should be placed equally on all classes. We want to win the war, and win it as quickly as possible. If this amendment is left out of the bill, I hope its adoption by the House will have the effect of speeding up the State Department. But I trust the motion to recommit will receive the support of those Members who believe in the justice of my amendment.

I am for this bill, and I do not want to delay its passage, and the motion to recommit will not delay it. [Applause.]

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman from Alabama yield to me two or three minutes?

Mr. DENT. I am going to yield to the gentleman from Alabama as soon as the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON], who is a member of the committee, asks me a question.

Mr. STEENERSON. Section 1, that is now being discussed—this provision in regard to alien slackers seems to draw a very unfair distinction between an alien who has declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States and one who has not, inasmuch as after the war is over the slackers who the gentleman has described, these 15,000 Greeks in his town, can be naturalized and become full citizens of the United States, whereas those who have declared their intention, who claim their exemption, are forever debarred from becoming citizens. It seems to me that if you bar them, you ought to bar both those who have declared their intention and those who have not. The clause reads:

That a citizen or subject of a country neutral in the present war who has declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States shall be relieved from liability to military service upon his making a declaration, in accordance with such regulations as the President may prescribe, withdrawing his intention to become a citizen of the United States, which shall operate and be held to cancel his declaration of intention to become an American citizen, and he shall forever be debarred from becoming a citizen of the United States.

The further question arises: Is not this a violation of the constitutional provision which requires that Congress shall have power to make "a uniform law on naturalization"? This makes it dependent upon the order of the President as to the conditions under which a man shall withdraw his declaration and claim his exemption, and it is not uniform. Did the committee consider the question whether this complies with the Constitution requiring that a uniform rule of naturalization shall be prescribed by Congress? This seems to be violation of that. If that be so, the act would be void and you would fail to accomplish what you desired.

Mr. DENT. I will state to the gentleman that that constitutional question was not raised in conference at all.

Mr. STEENERSON. I assumed not.

Mr. DENT. I am inclined to think that where the law applies to everyone similarly situated it would be uniform.

Mr. STEENERSON. But there is a condition put in there in respect to what the President's proclamations are. That deprives it of uniformity, for you may prescribe one rule to-day and another to-morrow. It will operate unequally. If we are passing a void act, we better see that it is corrected. While I shall vote to adopt the conference report, I think this matter should be corrected hereafter.

Mr. DENT. The act itself would not be void; only that part of it would. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE].

Mr. MCKENZIE. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I wish simply to say that I am in entire sympathy with the purpose of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCCULLOCH]. At this time, when we are about to decide to draft the American boys of 18 and 19 and put them into the Army, I naturally feel that men who have come here from foreign lands to better their conditions and enjoy the blessings of this great land of ours ought to be either willing to fight for it or be given the option of getting out of the country and going back to their native land. [Applause.] But we have made a record on this proposition in the House. I am on record as voting for this proposition every opportunity that has been presented, and when one gentleman said to me that I was inconsistent, because I knew we could not draft aliens, I said to him that I knew that but that I also know that we can give them the option of either serving under the American flag or getting out. But, Mr. Speaker, we are now considering in the last moments one of the most important bills that has ever come before the Congress of the United States, and to move to recommit the bill now, with the record of this House written in letters across the Heavens that we believe in drafting aliens or deporting them from the country, I want to say to my friend from Ohio, with all of the sympathy in my heart for the proposition he advocates, I believe it would be unwise. I do not think it would be wise to recommit this very important bill upon this subject alone. That being true, feeling as I do about it, secure in the knowledge that my record is clear upon the proposition, I shall vote against the motion to recommit in order that the bill may go to the Senate and be concurred in and become a law this day. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee the reason that appealed to the conferees for excluding section 4 as it passed the House. I did not understand any reference to be made to section 4 from the reading of the statement by the Clerk.

Mr. DENT. There was no reference made. That is the section that was put in upon the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], providing for inspectors. Gen. Crowder appeared before the conferees and stated that he was doing that now, and that it would be better to leave it to regulations than to put it into the law. That is the only reason. There is no objection to the gentleman's idea.

Mr. TREADWAY. May I ask, further, if Gen. Crowder gave the conferees any information as to the extent to which he was doing it under regulations?

Mr. DENT. We did not go into that section very fully, but he promised us that he proposed to do it just as fully as it possibly could be done, so that the idea of the gentleman is being carried into effect by the regulations.

Mr. TREADWAY. And will be extended, according to his statement to the conferees?

Mr. DENT. That is the promise that is made by the War Department.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I believe I have about two minutes remaining.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Three minutes.

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts for a question, and then I propose to move the previous question on the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman state whether section 8, permitting officers to buy uniforms, accouterments, and so forth, at cost, was inserted as a substitute for the provision that privates should not be any longer compelled to pay $1 a month for their laundry?

Mr. DENT. The gentleman certainly knows it was not.

Mr. WALSH. I did not know; I did not know what the Senate did with that.

Mr. DENT. No; it was not substituted for that. I thought I explained in the beginning that the provision in regard to the laundry of the enlisted men was in a portion of the House bill which provides an appropriation, and we decided that as this bill would require a deficiency appropriation all appropriations ought to be taken care of in that one bill.

Mr. WALSH. I did not hear that part of the gentleman's statement.

Mr. DENT. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. DENISON. Is all time exhausted?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time is exhausted. The gentleman from Alabama moves the previous question, and the question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. MCCULLOCH. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the conference report on the bill H. R. 12731 to the conferees, with instructions to insert the following as a new section.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MCCULLOCH moves to recommit the conference report to the conferees, with instructions to report the same back forthwith with the following amendment:

"That every alien who is a citizen or subject of any of the countries cobelligerent with the United States in the present war shall, unless contrary to existing treaties or treaties hereafter concluded, be subject to military service and shall not be granted exemption from military service or placed in deferred classification under the provisions of this act or under any rule or regulation to be issued by authority granted under the provisions of this act solely on account of alienage: And provided further, That the War Department shall immediately after the passage of this act reclassify all aliens heretofore registered who are citizens or subjects of any of the countries cobelligerent with the United States in the present war and who have been exempted or placed in deferred classification on account of alienage, and said aliens shall be called for service the same as citizens of the United States, unless such action would be contrary to existing treaties or treaties hereafter concluded: Provided further, That the President of the United States may at any time by Executive order suspend the operation of any of the provisions of the foregoing section as they relate to any of the cobelligerent countries, if in his opinion the enforcement of such provisions would create any international complications."

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CALDWELL. Is it in order to move to recommit and insert an amendment that was in the House bill? Would not the parliamentary proposition be to further insist, and that before the previous question was moved?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But the previous question was——

Mr. CALDWELL. The point is this: Is it in order to move to recommit with instructions to insert an amendment that was in the House bill as passed by the House? Would not a motion to further insist on the House amendment be a proper motion, and should not that motion have been made before the previous question was ordered?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion has been made. The Senate has not discharged the conferees. This motion is in order.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I was going to suggest that I hope the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCCULLOCH] will get a vote on his motion.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MCCULLOCH. Division, Mr. Speaker!

The House divided; and there were—ayes 26, noes 115.

So the motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. DENT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I suppose the House understands the attitude in which we find ourselves in reference to the District appropriation bill (H. R. 11692).

Mr. WALSH. Is the gentleman calling up a conference report, or what is before the House?

Mr. SISSON. I am calling up the District appropriation bill, and I want to explain the position in which we find ourselves.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. GARD. I will ask the gentleman if he has the conference report?

Mr. SISSON. There is no conference report. I want to explain to the House the attitude in which we find ourselves.

Mr. GARD. The matter ought to be explained to a larger attendance than is here now, and I make the point there is no quorum.

Mr. SISSON. The point I am going to make is one which will necessitate unanimous consent, for the reason that the House made a motion to adhere. I am now endeavoring to present a proposition to the House which, I hope, will give us an appropriation bill for the District of Columbia; and if any gentleman desires to object he can avail himself of that opportunity now, because I am going to ask that in the present situation we recede from amendment No. 1, which is the half-and-half amendment, and that the House insist upon its position on amendments Nos. 61 and 83.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. What are they?

Mr. SISSON. No. 1 is the half-and-half amendment. No. 61 and No. 83—I do not recall which one—is the McKellar amendment, put on in the Senate, in reference to some property. It is an amendment that has been knocking about here for a number of years. The other is a change in relation to the playgrounds. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that the House recede from its position in amendment No. 1 and that it insist upon its position on amendments Nos. 61 and 83.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for an inquiry?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. First, is there objection to the unanimous-consent request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. GARD. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. MONDELL. Reserving the right to object, the gentleman requests that the House recede from its position relative to the half-and-half amendment, and adhere to its position in regard to the other two amendments that he referred to?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, has the House taken officially any position, except in the general way, of disagreeing to all these later Senate amendments?

Mr. SISSON. Yes. We had a separate vote on the half-and-half amendment, and it was adhered to by 49 majority. Then I made a similar motion as to Nos. 63 and 83, and there was no roll call, but by an overwhelming viva voce vote we agreed upon the same motion.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. GOOD. I think the gentleman from Mississippi did not mean to ask to still further adhere. I think he meant to ask to still further insist.

Mr. SISSON. I am not going to ask that the House appoint any conferees. I am going to endeavor to do what I can to get a District bill. I think the other matter is pretty generally understood.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I do not think the gentleman will accomplish that by getting unanimous consent to do what he asked. The House has voted to adhere. He should ask, it seems to me, unanimous consent to rescind the vote by which we adhered, and ask that we still further insist on amendments 61 and 83. That is the technical situation.

Mr. SISSON. Yes. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, that that could be made in one unanimous-consent request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. So I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the House recede from its position in regard to amendment No. 1, the half-and-half amendment, and that it insist upon its disagreement as to amendments Nos. 61 and 83 and vacate the order by which it adhered on amendment No. 1. I ask that that order be vacated.

Mr. WALSH. You want to vacate the whole order. You want to vacate all the things whereby we adhered. Now you want to insist instead of adhere as to amendments Nos. 61 and 83.

Mr. SISSON. I do not want to do further than simply to change the House position as to amendment No. 1.

Mr. WALSH. You will not get into conference on Nos. 61 and 83.

Mr. SISSON. We do not want any conference. We are going to send it over to the Senate with those two amendments. I do not believe this House is ever going to consent to the McKellar amendment. That amendment has been before the House repeatedly. I suppose the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] recollects something about that amendment.

Mr. CANNON. I do not recollect it.

Mr. SISSON. The House has never consented to it, and I doubt if it ever will. If there is any merit in it, the claimant can take it up as a claim and prosecute it, if he gets permission to present a claim against the District treasury. The House can grant it if it so desires to do. But he has had his day in court and I will not consent to it, and I think the bill should fail rather than that we should consent to it.

Mr. FLOOD. You are pleading the statute of limitations?

Mr. SISSON. No; I am not pleading the statute of limitations in a Government matter.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman thinks the Senate will recede?

Mr. SISSON. I think it will.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] asks unanimous consent that the House recede from its position on amendment No. 1 and insist on amendments Nos. 61 and 83. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that all the previous acts of the House should be set aside by unanimous consent, and I am constrained, therefore, to object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio objects.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the conference report on the draft law.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the conference report on the draft law. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the conference report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California makes the same request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, August 30, 1918.

Rabbi Edward B. M. Browne, of New York City, honorary president of the American Jewish Seventy Elders, offered the following prayer:

Our Father who are in heaven, on earth, and all over the universe, hallowed is Thy name. Thy kingdom has come with the dawn of creation and, being established upon principles eternal and universal, its laws enforce themselves alike in all climes and in all ages, wherefore Thy will must be done among the celestial in heaven, even as it is amongst Thy mortal sons on earth. Thou hast endowed nature with productive energies subservient to man's will, whereby Thou givest us this day our daily bread, while by imparting us Thy divine spirit Thou enablest us to enact laws for the guidance of society, so that human passions lead us not into temptation, but divine grace delivers us from all evil.

For that very purpose are here assembled the Senators of our great Nation in this Sinai of modern times, and as Thou hast been with Moses on the peak of Horeb so may Thy Shekinah rest to-day upon every one of the Senators here assembled and cause them to bear in mind that while here to represent the will of the people they shall not misrepresent the will of Thee, who art our Father and our Lord.

We pray, O Lord, Thy special blessing upon the President of the United States, our "olive-branch" President, who is waging this "olive-branch" war to give a genuine "olive-branch" peace to this blood-flooded world, based upon the "golden rule" and the divine principle of religious magnanimity to forgive those who trespass against us, even as Thou forgivest our trespasses against Thee.

We pray, O Lord, Thy special guidance for our own patriotic boys who are now ready to lay down their lives for the cause of justice and humanity, each of them being a "lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world." And bless, also, the patriotic mothers who have sent out those boys in order to sacrifice themselves for their country and for humanity.

We thank Thee, O Lord, that Thou hast selected the United States as the chosen people of modern times to be the chief among all the nations of the earth in this great universal struggle. But let us not be vainglorious over that great distinction, for whatsoever are our potentialities for goodness and for greatness they are only through Thee, for Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. SMOOT and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives by G. F. Turner, one of its clerks, announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12731) amending the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917.

The message also announced that the House recedes from its adherence to its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 61, and 83 to the bill (H. R. 11692) making appropriation to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, agrees to amendment numbered 1, and further insists upon its disagreement to amendments numbered 61 and 83.

PETITIONS.

Mr. NELSON presented petitions of sundry citizens of Spring Valley, Mound, Belgrade, Hector, Slayton, Milan, and Verndale, all in the State of Minnesota, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

DAUPHIN ISLAND BRIDGES, MOBILE HARBOR.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 4598) further extending the time for the commencement and completion of the bridge or bridges authorized by an act entitled "An act to amend an act to authorize the Dauphin Island Railway & Harbor Co., its successors or assigns, to construct and maintain a bridge or bridges, or viaducts, across the water between the mainland, at or near Cedar Point, and Dauphin Island, both Little and Big; also to dredge a channel from the deep waters of Mobile Bay into Dauphin Bay; also to construct and maintain docks and wharves along both Little and Big Dauphin Islands," approved June 18, 1912, as extended by an act approved June 30, 1916, and I submit a report (No. 557) thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read:

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time for the commencement and completion of the bridge or bridges authorized by the act entitled "An act to amend an act to authorize the Dauphin Island Railway & Harbor Co., its successors or assigns, to construct and maintain a bridge or bridges, or viaducts, across the water between the mainland, at or near Cedar Point, and Dauphin Island, both Little and Big; also to dredge a channel from the deep waters of Mobile Bay into Dauphin Bay; also to construct and maintain docks and wharves along both Little and Big Dauphin Islands," approved June 18, 1912, as extended by an act approved June 30, 1916, is hereby further extended to five and seven years, respectively, from and after the 18th day of September, 1916.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

UNIVERSAL MILITARY TRAINING AND EDUCATION.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to a matter printed in the Evening Star of yesterday. I ask the Secretary to read it for the purpose of interrogating the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs or some other member of that committee as to its authenticity; that is to say, as to the correctness of the statement which was made in it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. What is the request?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The request is that the Secretary read an article in the Evening Star of last evening as a foundation for interrogating the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee or some other member.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Has the morning business closed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business has not closed.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I object until the morning business is closed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Will the Senate determine that this article shall be read, as requested by the Senator from Indiana? [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it. The ayes have it, and the Secretary will read.

The SECRETARY. Reading from the first page, Evening Star, Washington, D. C., Thursday, August 29:

UNITED STATES TO FINANCE BOYS IN COLLEGES—OPENS DOORS TO YOUTHS OF 18 WHO PASS ENTRANCE EXAMINATIONS—GEN. MARCH APPROVES.

[By David Lawrence.]

The United States Government has virtually taken over the universities and colleges of the country. Any boy of 18 who can pass the entrance requirements can go to any of the colleges, large or small, in the East or West, and get instruction and subsistence at the expense of the Government.

How long he will be permitted to stay in his course before being summoned to active service depends upon two things—his record in scholarship and the military demands of the forthcoming year.

But the War Department has just agreed to enter into contracts with upward of 400 universities and colleges, beginning on October 1, for the payment of tuition and board for all the boys of 18 who will have been registered or enrolled on September 7 next under the terms of the new man-power law. Inasmuch as most colleges depend upon tuition fees to pay their professors and instructors the Government is in a sense supporting the educational institutions during the period of the war when the calls of the Army and Navy would otherwise have disrupted the private colleges and unendowed schools of the country.

SCHEME OPERATES OCTOBER 1.

It had been intended at first to enter into contracts with the colleges only after the students became available, but the new plan just approved by Gen. March, Chief of Staff of the United States Army, is to begin the operation of the scheme on October 1, so that no time may be lost by the students or the colleges in giving the maximum amount of instruction before the boys are called to the colors.

The system of operation, therefore, will be about like this:

A boy who is not yet 18 enters college in the usual way by certificate from his preparatory school or entrance examinations, and if he becomes 18 years of age during the college year he will register under the terms of the new law providing periodical registration days, and will be promptly inducted into the military service by the military commander stationed at the university or college where the boy has begun his course.

AS TO BOYS NOW 18 YEARS OLD.

A boy who is already 18 years old will register on September 7 and will present himself in the usual way for entrance to the college or university of his preference. He will be inducted into the military service at that institution at the same time that he passes the entrance examinations or meets the requirements of the college. From that moment on he is no longer in the jurisdiction of the local or district boards of the city in which he resides, but as a member of the United States Army, subject to the orders of the military commander stationed in the district where the school or college is located.

The college year will be divided into quarters. These will undoubtedly be examinations at the end of each quarter. The question of whether a boy shall be continued in college as possible material for officers' training camps later on or transferred to a noncommissioned officers' school or ordered to report to a division of the draft army for service beginning as a private depends upon the opinion not merely of the military commander, but the college authorities, who will cooperate in passing upon the status of each individual.

CURRICULUM PLANS.

But inasmuch as the Government is bearing the cost of instruction, the War Department's special committee of Army officers and educators, who know exactly what are the needs and requirements of the Army for commissioned and noncommissioned officers, will have a great deal to say about the curriculum and how much of it shall be military, technical, or scientific, though it will have to depend upon the opinion of the college authorities and the results of examinations to determine the special fitness of each student for the different branches of the service into which the young officers can later be taken.

Undoubtedly the Navy will have a part in the plans so that a process of selection can be introduced which will enable the Navy to take men who are trained in special courses and give them naval instruction later on to fit them for commissions.

DIVIDE YEAR IN QUARTERS.

By dividing the year into quarters it will be possible to enter new students four times a year. Thus boys of 18 who have had a high-school education, but who have never prepared for college will have an opportunity, if they show aptitude for further education, to be selected from among their fellows and sent to technical schools or colleges. Merit will be the test all along the line.

If a boy of 18 can pass the examinations set before him he may conceivably have spent six months a private in the Army and be sent as a result of an examination to enter Yale, Harvard, or Princeton, or any of the numerous colleges with which the Government will have contracted for student instruction.

Thus far contracts are entered into only for the year ending June 30, 1919, but as the scheme works out during the next few months and provision must be made to take care of the boys who will be ready to enter college in the autumn of 1919, it is probable that arrangements for further instruction and cooperation with the colleges will then be made. Out of it all the Government intends that some permanent system of universal military training and education shall grow.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, this article shows that, with the consent and approval of Gen. March, as I understand it, 400 colleges in the United States are to be taken over under the operation of the draft act that was passed last week for the purpose of training a certain number of young men 18, 19, and 20 years of age.

I wish to ask the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee or some other member or members of that committee what authority for that action is given in that act? I was on the floor most of the time during the debate, and I feel quite sure that no person at any time during the progress of the discussion made any reference whatever to any such system as this, and I am trying to find out whether this is correctly stated, and, if so, what authority is given for it. I should be glad if the chairman would give us the benefit of his information.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I regret very much that I can not give the Senator the information he asks for. I do not know from whence the article emanated, whether it was authoritative as having come from the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy or from the War Department or Navy Department. I do not know where it came from. The first I knew of it was when I saw it in the Star yesterday afternoon.

I might say this to the Senator, that in the course of the consideration of the draft act Dr. C. R. Mann, who was a professor of physics at the University of Chicago, appeared before the committee and testified to some of the activities that were being engaged in by him and other members of an advisory commission—some civilians and some officers—who were undertaking to assist the War Department in the matter of the education of young men.

If the Senator will permit me, I do not know that this grows out of that at all, but it is barely possible that it emanates from this commission.

At page 91 of the hearings, Dr. Mann, after stating who he was, said he came here last fall as a member of the advisory commission of the Council of National Defense to see if he could find out what engineering and technical schools could do to help the Government in this emergency.

He said:

Out of the work of this committee gradually grew the appointment of a committee on education and special training in the War Department, which is a branch of the training section of the war plans division of the General Staff. The committee on education and special training is composed of four officers, one from the General Staff, one from the Provost Marshal General's office, one from The Adjutant General's office, and one from the training committee of the War College.

The names of the commission are given. These gentlemen have been trying, in cooperation with the General Staff, to formulate a plan for the training of the young men, and it is barely possible, though I do not know anything about it, that they have reached some conclusion with reference to the young men. This article may state the result of those conclusions; but, so far as I am concerned, I know nothing about it whatsoever than what is published in the paper.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, I desire to say that the provision we inserted in the draft-extension bill in regard to education was designed for boys under 21 years of age who had served in France, for the period which the Government should supply them with education was the period which they had passed in active service, not to exceed two years. This scheme, as I heard it read, is apparently to take all the colleges now and to use them for the education of young men before they enter the Army. Does the provision in the conference report in that respect provide for such a system as that?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The conferees adopted the House provision instead of the Senate provision on the subject of education. I will read it to the Senator, in order that he may see what the provision of the conference report is.

Mr. LODGE. I shall be obliged to the Senator if he will do so.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Section 7 of the bill as reported and agreed upon in the conference provides:

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of War is authorized to assign to educational institutions, for special and technical training, soldiers who enter the military service under the provisions of this act in such numbers and under such regulations as he may prescribe; and is authorized to contract with such educational institutions for the subsistence, quarters, and military and academic instruction of such soldiers.

That was the House provision.

Mr. LODGE. But that does not authorize the Government to take the colleges over.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Not at all.

Mr. LODGE. It simply allows the War Department to assign young men for military training to certain colleges. That has been done to some extent already. At the beginning of the war the department sent a few young men to Harvard University for instruction in radio work. That school has grown to over 3,000 by the Government sending those young men there, and the college has been struggling—I think with some success—to meet the situation. I presume that is what the provision in the conference report is aimed at and not to take possession of all the colleges of the country and use them for the general education of young men. As the Senator from Oregon has read the provision, it specifically provides for instruction in certain technical branches of military training.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is all.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Pardon me just a moment. The Senator from Massachusetts will remember that there was a good deal of discussion and criticism of the Senate provision in the Senate, and it seemed to me that when we got into conference about the matter it was pretty well granted that there was an uncertainty; that it was a future matter, one that could be provided for in the future.

Mr. LODGE. I thought so, and I therefore voted against it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. But here was a present proposition; and the Senate conferees thought it best to adopt that provision for taking care of the young men now, rather than in the future.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. KIRBY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. WATSON. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in this connection, I wish to say that certain schools in different parts of the country have already been designated for the training of boys of 18, 19, and 20 years of age. The committee on education and special training has, I know, designated three of the schools in the State of Utah, and those schools are now preparing for the reception of students for the purpose of special instruction and training. I do not understand that the Government pays a dollar of the expense; I understand that the schools stand for the expense, with the single exception, I will say, of an Army officer designated to the particular school as instructor in military tactics. I know that is the case in my own State, and I have also understood that it was the practice in other States.

I rather think that the article that has been read at the desk refers to that particular activity on the part of the committee on education and special training in the War Department. I will say to the Senator, however, that I have no knowledge as to whether there is such a program, as is apparently outlined in this article; but up to the present time I do not believe that anything has been done to justify the statement contained therein.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, this article is written——

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. WATSON. I will yield in just a moment. This article is written by Mr. David Lawrence, and it is generally understood that he speaks with some knowledge of the situation.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana declines to yield for the present.

Mr. WATSON. This article states specifically that the War Department has entered into an arrangement with 400 universities and colleges, beginning on October 1, for the payment of tuition and board for all the boys of 18 who will have registered or enrolled on September 7. That is a definite proposition on the part of the Government.

Mr. LODGE. That is entirely different from what the law provides.

Mr. WATSON. Precisely, and I want to ascertain from some member of the Military Affairs Committee what authority exists for any such action as that by the Military Department of the Government.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, so far as my knowledge of the Committee on Military Affairs and its workings goes I desire to say that I know of no law under which a measure as elaborate is suggested in that article could be carried out. Certainly no consideration by that committee has been had of anything like that proposition in magnitude and general application.

Of course, there have been for many years officers detailed to colleges in the States to give instruction in military tactics. That practice may be and probably will be considerably enlarged upon under the law to which the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has referred; also under laws now being considered as to education in specific scientific lines; but this article, of the contents of which I knew nothing until it was read to me last night, is very surprising, because action therein contemplated must have been taken under some general legislation and not under existing specific legislation in the way either of appropriation or of military law.

Mr. WATSON. I quite agree with the Senator that there is no law authorizing this sort of action to be taken; but here is a proposition substantially to take over 400 colleges in the United States and to place in those colleges, at the expense of the Government for tuition and subsistence, as many scholars as they can accommodate. There is not anything said about military training, but these young men are to be sent to college, so far as this article recites, for mental development and intellectual culture. Of course, there might be military training as a side affair; but, after all, when we passed the draft-extension bill it was done with the definite and specific understanding that these men were needed on the battle front in France in order to win the war next year; and Gen. March specifically stated—and his statement was read on this floor of the debate over and over again—that all of these men were needed and would be on the battle front in France by the 30th day of next June.

Now, here is a proposition to deflect a number of young men and to place them in educational institutions for the purpose of military instruction on the side; but, in reality, for the purpose of mental instruction, the usual college curriculum to be followed by those who thus enter the institutions.

Mr. SHERMAN and Mr. FLETCHER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. WATSON. I will yield first to the Senator from Illinois and then to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. SHERMAN. That article states, according to the Senator's explanation, that the Government is to take over 400 universities and colleges?

Mr. WATSON. Yes.

Mr. SHERMAN. Has the Senator considered whether it is not a part of taking everything that the Government can get its hands on and that is in sight?

Mr. WATSON. That is precisely what I am trying to find out. There seems to be no authority of law for this procedure. Now I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, as I understand the situation, it is intended to provide training for boys between 18 and 19 years of age. Now, whether that training is to take place in camp or whether at certain colleges where the training can be supplied properly and to the best advantage it is a question for the War Department to determine. They can decide that where boys 18 years of age are attending school or desire to attend school where they can obtain the military training that is required, they will be permitted to do so. They will be subject to call; they will be enlisted; they will get the benefit of the $30 a month and of uniform and equipment. That is the expense that is referred to, perhaps, in the article mentioned by the Senator, just the same as they would get those things if they were in camp. The only difference is that they would be allowed to get this training in the colleges which are selected and which can afford the training and are selected for that reason. The Government will not pay any more nor any less in that event than it would pay if the training were given in the camps. The training lasts for one year between the ages of 18 and 19.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WATSON. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the conference report to which the Senator from Oregon has referred, in section 7, I think, after reading it carefully, gives that authority specifically, because it reads as follows:

That the Secretary of War is authorized to assign to educational institutions, for special and technical training, soldiers who enter the military service under the provisions of this act in such numbers and under such regulations as he may prescribe; and is authorized to contract with such educational institutions for the subsistence, quarters, and military and academic instruction of such soldiers.

My remarks made a few moments ago referred not to what action may be taken under the draft-extension bill when it becomes a law, but to what had been done in the past. I have no doubt, however, that, under the wording I have read, authorizing the Secretary of War to contract with educational institutions for the subsistence, quarters, and military and academic instruction of such soldiers, he is given authority to pay for the education and for all expenses attached to the education of the soldiers who may be sent to the different institutions. As to the number of colleges, there is no limit. There may be 400 or there may be 1,000. I believe that there is nothing in the provision authorizing the Secretary of War to take over the educational institutions, but it does give authority to incur the expense involved in the plan, and nobody can tell how much that will be.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from Indiana for just a moment?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is being done and has been done for a good while, as the Senator from Utah knows. As the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] said awhile ago, the department is utilizing some of the colleges for special training not only in ordnance and other scientific branches but in aviation as well.

Mr. SMOOT. But they are not paying the expenses, are they?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. But the bill under consideration is not a law yet.

Mr. WATSON. No; it is not yet the law.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator from Indiana was asking about the statement which he has had read. If what is referred to in the article has been done, there is no authority for it. If they are operating under the provision of the conference report, of course it is not a law yet, and I assume that they have not attempted to act under it.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, the article says that the department has already contracted with 400 universities. I read the testimony before the committee with some interest, because I was somewhat reluctant to vote to send 18-year-old boys to the battle front, and did not intend to do so unless the stern necessity for such action was shown. I saw nothing in the hearings with regard to a proposition of this character, and certainly there was not a single syllable uttered in the debate on the floor of the Senate with reference to such a proposition. Therefore it seems to me to run counter to the whole spirit of the bill which we passed.

The Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] has said that the soldiers who enter these colleges are to have military training at the various institutions instead of at the training camps; but, Senators, we all know how futile that sort of military training would be. If a man is there for educational purposes, and his training mentally and intellectually amounts to anything, he can not devote his time and energy to the military training which is essential to make a soldier of him, such as is required on the modern battle field. If, on the other hand, he devotes his time exclusively to military training, as he ought to devote his time if he is to be thoroughly developed, qualified and equipped for military service in these days, then his intellectual training can be of no consequence and will practically amount to a negligible quantity. Therefore, I think that the very last sentence in the article read explains the whole situation, and that is that in some way or other out of this is to grow a permanent policy; that is to say, in my judgment, it is nothing more nor less than a part of the whole socialistic policy, a part of the socialistic program heretofore adopted along so many other lines, such as the taking over of the railroads, the taking over of the telegraphs, the taking over of the telephones, and the taking over of the express companies, to be followed evidently by the taking over of the mines and then of the oil fields, and then of various public utilities and agencies. The taking over of these institutions for the purpose of educating young men at the public expense is but an additional step in the socialistic program that has heretofore been adopted in our governmental affairs by men in high places who are socialists.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. WATSON. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. As I understand the terms of the conference report, the intention of Congress certainly is, under the wording as I heard it read, to authorize the department to assign men drafted for military service to educational institutions for special and technical training.

Mr. WATSON. For special and technical training.

Mr. LODGE. That is being done now; but, according to the article as it has been read, the plan is to take two or three million young men registered under the new law who are not yet 21 years of age, and give them academic and general education.

Mr. WATSON. Precisely; and not only that, but it proposes to take over 400 colleges.

Mr. LODGE. That is, to absorb the whole educational system of the country?

Mr. WATSON. Precisely; there it is in a nutshell. But suppose they take over the 400 colleges. I am told by a college president, with whom I conferred this morning, that at the full limit 120,000 is the maximum that can be educated at any one time by these 400 colleges. If they can only educate 120,000, who is to select the 120,000 out of the 3,000,000 who will be drafted? He said that his theory was that the 120,000 would consist of those already in the colleges. We might naturally suppose, as this article in one place inferred, that it was the sons of the poorer persons who would be taken in and benefited by the operations of this scheme; but evidently that would not be the case if the 120,000 already in these colleges are no longer to be educated by their parents, but the expense of their education is to be transferred to the Government and from this time on their tuition and their subsistence in these institutions is to be paid for by the Government and not by their parents.

Therefore I can not see, in the first place, that there is any authority for it; and, in the second place, that any great number of people are to be benefited by it. All I can see is that it is an open door to a future policy which has been so well outlined in the previous days of this administration. That is why I object to it. I do not believe there is any authority for it; I believe it is entirely outside of the limits of the authority of the Secretary of War or Gen. March or any other person connected with the war administration and the war policies of the Government to so conduct the affairs of their department at this time.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I was about to observe that were I convinced that the War Department were going to do any such thing, I would regard it as seriously as the Senator from Indiana. I have not the slightest idea that they have any intention of doing such a thing, that they have any authority for doing such a thing or any money with which to pay for it. I merely note that the article is written by Mr. David Lawrence, which explains a great deal to me. It is well known that he is fairly actively engaged from time to time in what might be called political propaganda, and the spreading of this article over the United States, where I have no doubt it will be read by thousands and thousands of parents and young boys, is calculated to give the impression that as a partial offset for whatever hardships may be incurred as the result of the new draft a paternal Government is to step in and educate free of charge every boy in this country who is 18 years of age. The vice of this article is that it is deceiving the American public, and it is not the first article of this kind that has gone out from Washington. There have been such from even more official sources than the author of this article.

In my humble judgment this article is on all fours with the deception practiced upon the people of this country in connection with the aircraft program. It is meant to assuage, it is meant to console, it is meant to give some little encouragement here or there, and for the time being tide over any little difficulty that may occur or may arise in public sentiment, if any such should arise.

I can only give my estimate of it, Mr. President. The War Department can not do this thing. It is a physical impossibility.

The vice of the matter is that every boy of 18 in this country will be misled when he reads that first paragraph, which reads:

Any boy of 18 who can pass the entrance requirements can go to any of the colleges, large or small, in the East or West, and get instruction and subsistence at the expense of the Government.

Senators, that is not true.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the article states that the department or Gen. March has already contracted with 400 educational institutions for this service. Does the Senator doubt that statement?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not know whether or not the department has contracted for any services from educational institutions, but I would be willing to wager that if any such contracts have been made they are solely and entirely for the special and technical training of men selected for that very purpose for special service later on in the Army, not for all boys of 18.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What does the Senator think of the statement in the article in substance to the effect that the college authorities are to have something to say about whether the boys possess the qualifications necessary for officers of the Army?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I can only once more remind the Senator of the authorship of the article.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I had not had occasion to read this article or understand anything about its terms and proposals until it was suggested here. I do not know whether there is foundation for it or not. There is so much misinformation in the newspapers and in some reports that might be considered official around here that I want to state all I know about the matter.

When we discussed this matter before the Military Affairs Committee, and had a hearing with Gen. March, and the Secretary of War and Gen. Crowder present, it was the determination, as expressed, to put these boys who are registered, called in the draft, into the service, into camp, and into France before the first day of next June. They said the necessity required that it should be done.

All who are to go to France are expected to have from four to six months' training before leaving here, which will necessitate their being called about the first of the year. I asked at that time about the purpose in view as to education, if it would not deprive all boys who were in high schools and colleges of the opportunity to finish their education, and it was said that they must be in camp or in France by the 1st day of next June. Then, on an inquiry from one of my constituents, who had had his 18-year-old boy in college one year and wanted to send him back in September, I wrote a letter to Gen. Crowder, stating I had had this inquiry, and that I had informed this constituent of mine, from my opinion formed at the hearings and his statement, that there would be no opportunity given for boys who were in college to finish their education; that it could not be done under the program as contemplated. Gen. Crowder wrote me a letter, in which he said that it was not expected that any boy would have an opportunity to complete his education except those in the medical, engineering, and chemistry department.

Now, that is as much as I know about the matter and the authority I have for that statement—that only those boys studying medicine, engineering, and chemistry would be given an opportunity to pursue their studies; that the others would be required by the draft for service.

There was another inquiry made of the Military Department, of those who were being heard and making explanations about the war program. One member of the committee suggested that there were many able men between 31 and 45 who had made an unqualified success of their business or their profession; that these men would not be able to leave their families and serve in the ranks as private soldiers; that they would probably be given deferred classification; but that their country ought not to be deprived of their eminent services in the capacity of officers; that if they were allowed to go into training camps they could be given commissions commensurate with their ability, and their services as officers might result to the great benefit of the Army and the Nation. It was said in reply, and I think it the right policy, that all the commissions and the training facilities for officers would be reserved for the men who were required under the terms of the draft to defend the country's cause upon the field of battle.

I think that is the right practice. I think the men who are required to go and must go are the men who ought first to be given the opportunity to take the training and to become officers. With that in view, which it seemed to me was the fair thing, I do not believe that it is the purpose of the Government to take these boys, whom they said it was so essential to have fighting on the front yonder by next June, and to distribute them around among the different colleges for education for the next two or three years. God knows I wish it might be done rather than that they should be compelled to go to France to fight the country's battles to the exclusion of the 13,000,000 men in the third age, 31 to 45, who are not to be called, and the seven and a half million men in the present draft who have been given deferred classification.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, what a useless inquiry by my friend from Indiana is that which he has just addressed to the Senate. He asks by what law or by what authority the particular program that is outlined in the article that has been read is to be carried into effect or consummated. Does not the Senator understand, as all of us understand, that any program that is sought to be carried out to-day is carried out, whether there be law or authority or whether there be no law or authority? The Senator from Indiana, just like all the rest of us, has contributed to the creation in the Nation to-day of an absolutism; and it does not make any difference what the Congress desires, or what the Congress may wish, or what the Congress may enact, that absolutism, under the urge and necessity and the dire crisis of war, does exactly as it sees fit.

Mr. President, I do not know whether the article that has been read is true or not. I do not care whether the policy that is enunciated in that article is socialistic or otherwise. If the salvage of a smashed democracy, Mr. President, shall be the education of our 18-year-old boys, I gladly welcome it; and I hope that some such program will be carried out.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the latter part of this news item—which I think is, to use the vernacular of the street, a mere feeler on public sentiment—says:

Out of it all the Government intends that some permanent system of universal military training and education shall grow.

Some time ago in this body there was a bill pending with which I had considerable sympathy, one that has been at proper intervals urged by the very competent chairman of the Military Affairs Committee [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], providing for what is known as universal military training. There was a kindly sentiment for that measure, I believe, in this body, and it might have carried had it not been for the Secretary of War, who said that his department had at that time no intention of urging upon Congress or the country a system of universal military training. This was taken to represent the sentiments of the administration on that question. Therefore, it has not been considered since. This, I take it, is in line with many other efforts of like kind.

There was some sentiment for an additional member of the Cabinet, Mr. President, to take charge of the aeronautic department of the military service. That was not received kindly in the administrative department. It was said to be a reflection upon the ability of the Secretary of War. I think it was not such a reflection, even by those who were very urgent for the adoption of that policy. It was merely for the purpose of expediting and making efficient the airplane service of this country to be used abroad. However, since that time the Secretary of War has clandestinely and secretly adopted the idea by appointing an officer of his own naming to do the same service that would be done by a separate member of the Cabinet. This educational scheme is in line with the same kind of conduct. He is opposed to universal military training, but is in favor—and this is intended to test public sentiment—of taking over 400 universities and colleges, starting a universal military training under the auspices of the Secretary of War, and thereby accomplishing, as he believes, the practical purposes intended by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs and by a majority of the Senate, in all probability, without adopting or giving credit to the useful idea advocated in the Senate.

Whenever there is a useful idea in the Senate on any kind of military or other question, whenever any original thought of any kind is entertained by a Senator or a Representative, unless it is made through the executive department and the spokesman is the Secretary of War or some other member of the Cabinet, that idea, however meritorious it may be, comes to an untimely end and is stillborn upon its delivery in this body. However, there is little distinction made between the quick and the dead by the Cabinet officers, because they possess the vital power of resurrection. They bring it forward in some particular guise, clad in a new uniform, shriven and sanctified by the executive department or by the greatest Secretary of War the world ever knew, and especially our own country, giving it a new name, bringing it forward as their offspring as an indispensable requisite of the war. The same idea condemned and ruined in Congress by Executive opposition is adopted and made alive by the executive department and hailed as a great advance in the art of waging war. I have seen it done, not once, not twice, but by actual count I can enumerate over 11 of those cases in which useful ideas have been delivered in this body, killed by the Executive frown, and afterwards resurrected by Executive favor.

This is a part of the same program. It wholly ignores the idea that if you or I or any of our colleagues have a boy we would like to send to a university or college of our own choice he will be inducted into the service, drafted after he has registered under the act recently passed and soon to be approved by the Executive; he is taken from our hands, from the control of every parent or guardian in this country; he is taken from those who have a natural interest in his welfare; he becomes a part of the military branch, and by a gross perversion of congressional authority vested in the Executive we become a paternal Government. The education of the vast number of 18 or 19 year old boys who are of university or college age is to be taken out of the hands of their natural guardians or their parents; they are to be taken by the Government as a military measure and then thrust into the college or university to suit the ideas of some autocrat or martinet in a department. That is what this means in practice.

If we must go back to the days of the Spartans in order to survive, as a last resort, I shall not complain. I will be subject to the implied and merited criticism offered by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] that we help create such a condition. I would if it is necessary to defend ourselves and to wage this war successfully; but I see no necessity for it at this time, either by legislation or by Executive order. It is a part of the same program which is on foot now to take over all the insurance companies in this country—life, fire, casualty, surety bonds, and every form of selling indemnity—by contract. That is now on foot. Taking over the German fire insurance companies by the Alien Property Custodian is made the entering wedge for engaging the Government in the fire insurance business. My distinguished colleague [Mr. LEWIS], who is now at the European end of the cable, with nations waiting upon his words, and engaged on a delicate mission for the President while he is a candidate in Illinois, by most entertaining interviews in Paris, has introduced in this body a bill for industrial insurance, which takes all the group insurance now written by private insurance companies, in whatever department of an industrial plant it is, and writes a collective policy, guaranteeing against casualties in that line of business.

That is proposed to be taken over by this bill offered by my distinguished colleague.

Here I might, parenthetically for a moment, Mr. President, protest against the somewhat light and frivolous way in which a House Member from the twenty-second Illinois district has referred to my distinguished colleague. I hope that he will hasten to his native shores with wings as swift as meditation or the thoughts of love that he may sweep to his parliamentary revenge. He is charged with a need to correct some dates, because having become the author of a textbook on constitutional law he was a candidate for Vice President, this critical Member of the House said, before he had reached the constitutional age to serve if he had been nominated and elected, which of itself he thinks will require some rearrangement of the chronology, which will come in due course and sufficiently when my colleague returns. I have no fear about the result when once he will reach our own shores and engage upon that subject. This is only incidental.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; I yield. I then will resume the trail I was following.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I notice according to the biography in the Congressional Directory of 1913 the birth of the Senator's colleague was stated as being in 1868, and from that, of course, arose the question about his eligibility for the Vice Presidency. I looked at the Congressional Directory this morning of the Sixty-fifth Congress, the first edition, and I find the date given there as May 18, 1863, still two years short, however, of the constitutional age for the Vice Presidency.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am sure that can be sufficiently explained.

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. Senators who have this morning indulged in the performance of attacking a Senator who is 3,000 miles away do not occupy a becoming attitude. They seem to find it chivalrous, indeed, to wait until the object of their attack is absent and until 3,000 miles of ocean roll between them before they assail and ridicule the senior Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator need not be so indignant.

Mr. ASHURST. I am not indignant.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is only giving him when he returns an opportunity for which he will thank everyone who opens the door.

Mr. ASHURST. It is not a matter of indignation. It is a matter of the propriety of assailing a man in this fashion. The absent Senator is our colleague; he represents in part a great State. I do not care in particular about the senior Senator from Illinois. There is no special friendship between him and me, but if a Republican Senator were assailed in this fashion I should protest.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator is entirely mistaken.

Mr. ASHURST. I protest against this procedure. An unfair thing is being done to Senator LEWIS. Let us be fair. Let us be gentlemen. Let us make our attack when he is here in the Senate and can respond. That is the way men ought to fight.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator was never more mistaken in his life. I am defending my absent colleague and saying I protest against the comment made by a Member of the House.

Mr. ASHURST. God save me from any such defense as that!

Mr. SHERMAN. I never said a disrespectful word, publicly or privately, of my colleague in my life. I have for him the greatest regard. I regret the Senator does not seem to appreciate my effort.

Mr. ASHURST. I believe that to be true. There is no more courteous, kind-hearted, scholarly, patriotic man in this body than the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN]. He has descended, however, this morning from the high position he always here occupies to find merriment at the expense of his colleague, who is far away and can not answer now. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] is a most courteous gentleman, and I hope he will no longer indulge in such unfair and ungenerous criticism of an absent Senator.

Mr. SHERMAN. I was intending to remark when the Senator from Arizona uttered his last paragraph that I protest in his absence especially against the somewhat facetious way in which the House Member commented upon such personal matters that can be explained. I know that my colleague will be very glad that I have called attention in the Senate to the comments made upon him by the House Member and that the dates will be arranged in such chronological order that there will be no discrepancy. I think it is a mere mistake in the Printing Office or in the haste of revising biographical matter. I am sure the kindly good nature of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] will absolve me from blame on reflection. I know when my colleague returns there will be not only accurate but adequate explanation, and I await with confidence that return. I do not feel at liberty to take up the matter in his absence, because it is so personal to him. I referred to it in connnection with the insurance measure named for the purpose of giving my colleague an opening when he does come and also giving an opening on the first convenient interval when the time will permit, on Monday or Tuesday next, if the condition of the calendar and the public business will justify, for some remarks of my own on another subject, the text of which will be "Unofficial and Personal Government in the United States." At that time, Mr. President, I expect to animadvert at considerable length upon this and some other things kindred to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business? The morning business is closed, and the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

STIMULATION OF AGRICULTURE.

The Senate as in Committee of the Whole resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11945) to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purposes of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to announce to the Senate that a number of amendments were passed over while the bill was under consideration. Without objection, they will be taken up in their order.

Mr. LODGE. This bill comes up under the unanimous-consent agreement as unfinished business at this time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the understanding of the Chair. The first amendment passed over will be reported.

The SECRETARY. The first amendment passed over when the bill was last under consideration will be found on page 2. Beginning at line 4 with the word "Provided," the committee proposes to strike out all down to and including the word "enacted," in line 18.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment passed over will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over will be found at the foot of page 3, where, on line 22, after the word "date," the committee proposes to insert the following words:

Provided, That of said sum, $2,500,000 is hereby made available to be used by the Secretary of Agriculture, if in his judgment the public interest requires it, to purchase seed wheat and to supply the same on credit to farmers in the Great Plains area west of the ninety-eighth meridian. In no case shall any such advance to any one farmer exceed $300, and in all cases the repayment of such advances shall be guaranteed by a State or national bank or secured by bonds of the United States commonly known as liberty bonds or other obligations of the United States or in part by both such guaranty and security. And it shall be the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture to make collection for all such advances on or before November 1, 1919, and to report such collections in detail to the Congress on the first Monday in December thereafter: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture may use such obligations of the United States as collateral to borrow money for supplying seed to farmers for cash in pursuance of law. And the Secretary is further empowered to prescribe proper rules and regulations for carrying into effect the provisions hereof: Provided further, That when the Secretary purchases such seed from anyone other than the producer thereof, he shall not pay such dealer or intermediary a net profit of more than 10 cents per bushel above cost of such seed to said dealer or intermediary.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee about the words "Great Plains area," in line 1, page 4. Just what territory would that cover?

Mr. GORE. It would include the territory west of the one hundredth meridian to the foothills of the Rockies.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It would not go beyond?

Mr. GORE. No, sir.

Mr. JONES of Washington. What objection would there be to going beyond that? I will state to the Senator the reason why I ask the question. I have gotten a telegram and resolution with reference to the conditions in four or five contiguous counties in the State of Washington where we have had during the last three or four years extremely short crops, and the farmers are in a very bad condition at this time with reference to seed wheat. They have petitioned and asked the Government for assistance. I should like to have that area covered by this legislation if possible. I think the conditions there are about as urgent as they are in any other section of the country, although it is not such a large territory, of course.

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senator that the idea was that the territory defined would include the principal wheat-producing area of the country, a section which is peculiarly liable to drought, and where two or three droughts have succeeded each other. It was peculiarly with reference to the wheat country that this limitation was inserted. Of course, there would be an element of injustice to exclude a region which would have an equal title to this sort of treatment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is what I thought. This is in wheat territory, although we have a good deal of semiarid territory in the State of Washington.

Mr. GORE. I will state further this is a sort of a paternalistic proposition, and the committee desired to be as conservative as they thought they might be.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Would the Senator have any objection to striking out the words "Great Plains," so that it would fall in the area west of the ninety-eighth meridian?

Mr. GORE. I have no objection to that.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I offer that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 1, of the committee amendment, strike out the words "Great Plains," so as to read "farmers in the area west of the ninety-eighth meridian."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Beginning with line 12, on page 4, the proviso is as follows:

Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture may use such obligations of the United States as collateral to borrow money for supplying seed to farmers for cash in pursuance of law.

I want to ask the Senator having the bill in charge if there was ever in the past legislation that authorized the Secretary of Agriculture to use the obligations of the Government as collateral to borrow money? That has always been done in the past through the Secretary of the Treasury. I do not know of an obligation of the Government that the Secretary of Agriculture controls or could handle as collateral security.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I think that the Senator is right in suggesting that this process is generally carried out by the Secretary of the Treasury. The obligations referred to are those taken by the Secretary of Agriculture in securing the debts for wheat advances. I assume that the margin would be ample to cover any depreciation in the obligation. It was thought that it might provide the means of a revolving fund and obviate an appropriation of a larger amount of money. I think that was the purpose in the mind of the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I will state this has reference to a revolving fund Congress has already authorized. There is no necessity whatever for this particular part of the amendment.

Mr. GORE. The Senator is mistaken on that point. The law requires that the seed shall be sold for cash, and that the money shall go to the revolving fund. Of course, when he makes a purchase of seed and sells to the farmers for cash he has cash by which to proceed; but this contains an amendment to the existing law authorizing the sale on time, taking liberty bonds as security for the debt. That would, of course, absorb the fund and there would not be a revolving fund. This proviso was inserted so as to continue the revolving-fund feature without making so large an appropriation out of the Treasury.

Mr. SMOOT. It does seem to me if we are going to allow any obligation to be incurred by the United States, it ought to be incurred through the regular department that always has had such matters in hand. If the Senator wants to reach what he has just stated, then let us make this amendment conform to the existing conditions and allow such loans to be made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, and let him receive the note and collateral security offered in payment of the seed wheat.

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senator I think there are a great many questionable points about this whole policy, and as far as I am personally concerned I have no objection to its going out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah make that motion?

Mr. SMOOT. I move to strike out the proviso beginning in line 12, page 4, down to and including the word "law" on line 15.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out of the amendment the following words:

Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture may use such obligations of the United States as collateral to borrow money for supplying seed to farmers for cash in pursuance of law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Utah to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. If I correctly understand this matter, and I do not say with confidence that I do, because I have just entered the Chamber, the elimination of these words would practically destroy the revolving feature of that fund.

Mr. SMOOT. No; it would not destroy the revolving feature at all. This is an extension of the revolving feature, allowing seed wheat to be sold on credit.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator is mistaken. As I understand it at present the amount appropriated made a revolving fund. That entire amount is always money because the present law requires that the sale shall be made in cash. So that fund can easily revolve. But it is proposed now by the amendment of the committee to permit sales to be made to farmers upon their notes properly secured. I believe the security is confined to liberty bonds. Sales therefore can be made not for cash but for liberty bonds. If the Secretary of the Treasury is not permitted to use those liberty bonds for the purpose of securing an additional fund and converting them into cash then, of course, there can be no fund to revolve because the money is exhausted in the first purchase.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SIMMONS. I may not understand it, but I think I do. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. The statement which the Senator has made is correct; but I want to call his attention to the fact that if we desire to grant time on the sales of wheat to farmers, as this intends shall be done, and to take liberty bonds as security for the wheat sold, the proper way for Congress to do would be to appropriate more money for the purchase of wheat and where sold on time have the security received go into the Treasury of the United States. This amendment, however, provides:

That the Secretary of Agriculture may use such obligations of the United States as collateral to borrow money for supplying seed to farmers for cash in pursuance of law.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. Pardon me just for a moment, in order that I may reply to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. That would be so, provided there were some amendment which permitted that sort of thing to be done; but if we eliminate this part of the amendment, then, undoubtedly, when the Secretary has expended the entire fund in the purchase of wheat which is to be supplied to the farmers and sells all of that wheat on time, there will be no fund to revolve. Now, it is proposed to strike out the provision in the bill which authorizes the Secretary to raise additional money upon the hypothecation of liberty bonds, which he has taken as security for the wheat which he has sold. If we strike that out and do not substitute anything in its place, then, of course, there will be no fund remaining to revolve. If the Senate in striking it out will provide by some other means for a revolving fund, then I shall have no objection to that; but to strike it out and let nothing remain except a provision that this fund be invested in wheat and the wheat be sold on time I think would bring about a result that would not be desirable. It would place too narrow a limitation upon the operations of the department in supplying the necessary seed to farmers in this country.

Mr. GORE. Or it would require too large an appropriation.

Mr. SMOOT. The original law authorizes the sale of wheat for cash. Now, if this proviso were stricken out, then the amendment would authorize the sale of wheat upon credit, secured by liberty bonds.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I will admit that what the Senator says is true, so far as additional money is concerned. With my proposed amendment adopted the Secretary of Agriculture would have only the amount of the appropriation which was made in the first place; but the remainder of the committee amendment does authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to sell the wheat not only for cash but upon credit by taking liberty bonds as security. That is all that ought to be done by the Secretary of Agriculture. If we want to meet this issue, then we ought to increase the amount that was appropriated for this purpose and pass this amendment without the proviso.

Mr. SIMMONS. I can see very well the situation would be met by an amendment which appropriated any amount that might be tied up by reason of the sale of the whole amount or of a part of the amount of wheat upon time; that would reach the situation. If the Senator has in mind an amendment to meet that situation I have no objection, but unless some provision is made by which this fund will not be exhausted, then I shall object.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator does not believe that it is good legislation to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to borrow money on behalf of the United States, does he?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not believe it is; but it is good legislation, I think, under these conditions. We are passing a great many acts now that are not good legislation, but which are necessary to meet a situation.

Mr. SMOOT. But in this case it may be so easily done the other way.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not myself think when a department here, in a process of certain business which we have intrusted to it, acquires liberty bonds that to permit it to hypothecate those liberty bonds to secure additional money to carry out the same purpose would be necessarily a serious offense against the usual financial policy of this Government.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. GORE. I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, there is no doubt that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] is correct in his conclusions as to what would be the effect of this amendment. If the proviso objected to by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], and which was about to be stricken out by the Senate, is stricken out, the money will be absorbed and can not revolve. It was the desire of the committee to permit the fund to revolve, and in that way to obviate a much larger appropriation. We thought that a system might be worked out which would be able to go on as a sort of going concern and take care of itself, and thus obviate a considerable strain on the Treasury.

There is no doubt that there is point in the objection of the Senator from Utah that this devolves a duty upon the Secretary of Agriculture which under ordinary circumstances would be devolved upon the Secretary of the Treasury; but I call the Senator's attention to the fact that we must do one of two things. We must either devolve upon the Secretary of the Treasury a duty that is ordinarily devolved upon the Secretary of Agriculture, a duty for which the Secretary of Agriculture has now equipment and organization—the purchase and sale of this seed—or else we must devolve upon the Secretary of Agriculture a duty which is usually devolved upon the Secretary of the Treasury. We have to take our choice between the two. I would ask the Senator from Utah, however, if it would meet his objection to say "that the Secretary of Agriculture, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury"?

Mr. SMOOT. That would make no difference, for I have absolute confidence in the Secretary of Agriculture. The only objection I have to it is the authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to borrow money upon the obligations of the Government. That should not be done. If we know how much money will be necessary to meet the situation after this amendment shall have been passed authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to sell this seed upon time, we ought to make the appropriation to cover it. Then the Secretary of Agriculture can sell wheat on time or for cash, as the case may be. He ought to decide the question, and we ought to furnish the money. In case the proviso is stricken out, then the money becomes a revolving fund, no matter whether the wheat is sold upon credit or for cash; and that is the proper way to do it.

Mr. GORE. But the fund could not revolve if the wheat is sold on credit.

Mr. SMOOT. It may, for the payments for wheat so sold as to one sale may fall due at one time and as to another sale may all fall due at another. The payments will not all fall due upon the same date.

Mr. GORE. But the entire season might have gone by.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, but there will be other seasons coming.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from Oklahoma?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. GORE. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. I was absent when this amendment came up, but I judge the proviso grows out of an amendment which was offered by me to the bill while it was pending before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. CURTIS. That amendment provided for the loaning of the money directly to farmers without taking of security, such as bonds or anything of that kind, but by giving their notes and a lien upon the crop. Since I offered that amendment the situation has been partially cared for by an advance of money which is being loaned through the Federal farm loan banks.

This amendment as it stands would do the people I have tried to assist no good, because they have not the security to put up, and in localities where they wanted assistance they have borrowed from the banks to such an extent that they are unable to borrow more at this time. I have received information from one county that at a meeting attended by all the bankers in the country it was stated that they had advanced and loaned all the money that they had on hand and could not advance any more unless they got it from the Government or from the Federal land banks or from some other source; that they could extend no further relief.

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senator that I intended to offer an amendment to this bill to meet that situation.

Mr. CURTIS. I was going to ask the Senator in regard to that. The situation which I intended to cover has been largely covered by an advance of $5,000,000, but the conditions are not entirely satisfactory as yet, although the situation has been partially relieved.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, does the Senator mean that we have increased the appropriation $5,000,000?

Mr. CURTIS. No; but there has been advanced from the emergency fund by the President $5,000,000, which has gone out through the Secretary of the Treasury to the farm-loan banks. As I understand, there is another class which needs assistance, and that is the men who are in a little better condition than those who were intended to be covered by the amendment offered by me, men who perhaps can put up the security, but the money is not in the locality to be loaned to them. I am told that that situation exists in a large number of counties in Texas, in some counties in western Oklahoma, in some in western Kansas, to some extent in western Nebraska, and quite extensively in Montana, and in some of the other Northwestern States.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. The only interest I have in this matter is that this fund shall be sufficient to serve the purpose that we have in view.

Mr. CURTIS. I was just getting to that question. I was going to ask the Senator from Oklahoma if he had secured specific information as to the amount that would be required to meet the situation that exists in Texas, Oklahoma, Kansas, Nebraska, the Dakotas, Montana, and other States?

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senator in that connection that I have here a bulletin of the Federal Reserve Board issued in December last. The Department of Agriculture had a study made of that very situation as it related to the fall planting of 1917 and the spring planting of 1918. The result of that investigation, made by Dr. Thompson, of the Bureau of Markets, Department of Agriculture, is published in this bulletin for December last. Unfortunately, the results are stated in terms of percentages and not in aggregate amounts. I have that report here, and intend later, if the occasion arises during the debate, to have it read to the Senate or printed in the RECORD. In one part of my own State the report shows that the local banks can supply only 49 per cent of the capital required by the farmers to carry on their business.

Mr. CURTIS. Right there, may I state that it was estimated by the committee representing the Kansas Agricultural Society that the banks in the different localities in Kansas could take care of 50 per cent of the money that was required by the farmers there, but not over 50 per cent.

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senator that this report shows that in southwest Kansas the percentage that can be supplied by the local banks is 44 per cent. In other parts of the State the percentage rises considerably above that amount, but probably would average in the neighborhood of 50 per cent, or perhaps more than that. The report does not state the figures in total amounts, but they are given in percentages, and, therefore, I have not been able to arrive at an estimate as to the aggregate amount. I will say to the Senator, however, that the Council of National Defense of the State of Texas in the last two or three days has adopted a resolution urging Congress to provide $50,000,000 for the State of Texas alone, on the theory that that is about one-third of the drought-stricken area; and in the amendment which I have prepared I intend to ask for $150,000,000.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The amendment that is referred to here involves the sum of two and a half million dollars for the purchase and sale to the farmers of seed wheat. In the light of the experience of last year, I wish to ask the Senator from Oklahoma if it is not true that the discussion which has been taking place here is more or less purely academic? The fact of the matter is that not a dollar of the fund was used last year for the purchase of seed wheat. The fund referred to now is to be used only for the purchase of seed wheat, but the Department of Agriculture, under a similar provision last year, bought no seed wheat, not a bushel. However, an arrangement, I understand, was effected whereby the grain corporation under the food administration should turn wheat over to the farmers who wanted seed wheat, at, I presume, a regulated price; but, so far as the activity of the Department of Agriculture is concerned, in the matter of purchasing seed wheat, being the subject matter of this particular amendment, nothing at all was done last year and not a dollar was therefore needed.

Mr. GORE. That might be true as to last year and not be true as to the current year.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I should like to state to the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] that it is not an academic question this year. There have been actual crop failures. Last year in our State we had a wheat-crop failure in 33 counties out of 105.

Mr. WOLCOTT. A failure due to what, I should like to ask the Senator—a failure due to inability to buy wheat, to the want of money?

Mr. CURTIS. No; the wheat was winterkilled. We have had two successive wheat failures in some of the counties in the State, and the situation in many of those counties is such that the banks are unable to loan enough money at this time to take care of it.

Mr. GORE. I will say, if the Senator from Kansas will allow me——

Mr. CURTIS. If the chairman of the committee will let me finish the statement, then I will yield the floor to him. I wish to state to him that the Senators and Members of the House with whom I have been working in this matter felt when this bill went over that the relief would come too late unless some other effort was made. Therefore, we went to the President and got the relief to the extent I have stated. That action was taken because the people interested had to know what would be done in order to prepare the ground for fall planting.

Mr. SIMMONS. In other words, the President is going to apportion for this purpose $5,000,000 of the money which we have placed in the fund at his disposal.

Mr. CURTIS. Which will partly relieve the situation.

Mr. SIMMONS. That will increase the fund in the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. CURTIS. It was put under the Secretary of the Treasury to be expended under proper rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SIMMONS. But it is being used to purchase seed wheat.

Mr. CURTIS. Partly.

Mr. SIMMONS. In view of that statement, I make no further objection.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] and to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] that before the fund made available under the order of the President can be loaned there is required an affidavit that the farmer has experienced two successive droughts; also an affidavit that the farmer is unable to obtain credit, and, I think, an affidavit from the bank that the bank is not in a situation to advance credit, and there is a bonus of $75 required to the hundred acres. Mr. President, before the vote is taken I should like to add, after the words "Secretary of Agriculture," the words "with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury." I think that ought to be in if the amendment remains in the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. The first question, Mr. President, will be on the amendment offered by me to strike it out. That, I think, ought to be done. The amendment ought to go out of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma, of course, has the right to perfect the text proposed to be stricken out. Does the Senator from Oklahoma insist upon his amendment?

Mr. GORE. Yes; I should like to have those words added, because the Senator's objection ought to be met to that extent.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all right. Then, my motion will come up later.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Utah will come up later. The Secretary will state the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma to the amendment reported by the committee.

The SECRETARY. After the words "Secretary of Agriculture," on page 4, line 13, in the amendment reported by the committee it is proposed to insert the words "with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Now the question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah to strike out the matter appearing in lines 12, 13, 14, and 15 as amended. [Putting the question.] By the sound, the ayes appear to have it.

Mr. GORE. I should like to have a standing vote on that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma requests a division. Those in favor of the motion of the Senator from Utah will rise. [A pause.] Those opposed will rise. [A pause.] The ayes are 4 and the nays—the Chair begs pardon; the motion of the Senator from Utah is lost. The question now is on the amendment as amended. [Putting the question.] The noes have it, and the amendment is rejected.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Was not the announcement of the Chair as to the number voting on the previous motion tantamount to the suggestion of the absence of a quorum?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes; the Chair presumes it was. Of course that suggestion is in order at any time.

Mr. GORE. On a division, I do not think that is true.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair inadvertently stated the number, which the Chair should not have done, because that is likely to suggest the absence of a quorum. Under the present situation the Senate has voted out this amendment.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, of course if there is no quorum here, they could not do that. I was trying to get the attention of the Chair to ascertain what he was announcing. I thought the amendment was agreed to on the former vote.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I was about to suggest that I thought the Senator did not understand what had been done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will put the question again. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over will be found on page 8, on line 22, where the total is changed, it being proposed to strike out "$2,136,028" and insert "$1,610,155."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment, the Chair is informed, was passed over at the request of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have no objection to the amendment being acted upon now.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to inquire a little about this interesting item. Under the proviso $5,000 is to be used to establish a market-news service on live stock and meats in the District of Columbia. Now, what in the world that is for I am unable to comprehend. We do not need a news service on meats in the District of Columbia as much as we need some regulation of prices. I should like to ask the chairman what the proviso is for.

Mr. GORE. As I remember, that proviso was inserted in the House; and I suppose—I am not advised upon that, because it is a House provision—it is to extend to the city of Washington the activities of the Bureau of Markets with respect to live stock. Whether or not it is to make it a live-stock center, I do not know. It went in on the floor of the House, as I recall.

Mr. WARREN. It was in the original bill.

Mr. KENYON. It seems to me that this is one of the most ridiculous of many ridiculous items in this bill. A news service on meats in the District of Columbia is a farce.

Mr. GORE. As I remember, the committee recommended that it be stricken from the bill; did it not?

Mr. KENYON. I think not, though my recollection is that the committee was of that mind.

Mr. GORE. My recollection is that we made that report; but it has been some time since we had this measure up, and, of course, it is not so fresh in my memory now as it was at an earlier time.

Mr. KENYON. Yes. I move to strike out the proviso.

Mr. SMOOT. What about the committee amendment?

Mr. KENYON. The committee amendment is involved in this, because, if my suggestion is adopted, the amount named in the committee amendment would have to be reduced.

Mr. SMOOT. No.

Mr. KENYON. If the proviso is struck out, then the amount should be reduced.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I sincerely hope this item will be stricken from the bill. I suppose every Senator every morning finds his desk loaded with circulars and bulletins from the departments, and it is getting so that the wastebasket we have is not large enough to receive these daily bulletins under the heading of news service. The waste is simply appalling.

It may be said that this is only $5,000. I will guarantee right now that if we adopt this provision, and this news service is established, it will be $25,000 next year, and there is no telling how many hundreds of thousands of dollars it will amount to before it is through.

I hope it will be stricken from the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa to strike out the last proviso on page 8.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KENYON. Then, Mr. President, the committee amendment on line 22 should be reduced by $5,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator make that motion?

Mr. KENYON. I make that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa moves to change the numerals on line 22, page 8, so as to read "$1,605,155."

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The SECRETARY. The amendment on line 17 of page 8 was passed over, striking out $449,700 and inserting $100,000, under the item for a fertilizer survey of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over is on page 9, line 15, where the committee proposed to insert, after the words "preparation of sweet sirups," the words "including grape sirup."

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I will say that I think all the other amendments, including this one, were passed over at my request; and that request was made, not because of opposition to the amendments, but in order to hasten the consideration of the prohibition amendment. So I withdraw the request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over is on lines 20 and 21, page 9, where the committee proposed to strike out the words "control of noxious rodents, $100,000," and the semicolon.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the striking out, I think, is under a misunderstanding. "Noxious rodents" were understood to be rats, mice, and so forth, whereas the department meant entirely another matter. I move that in place of the words "noxious rodents" the words "prairie dogs, gophers, and ground squirrels" be inserted, so that it will read:

Control of prairie dogs, gophers, and ground squirrels, $100,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. THOMAS and Mr. KENYON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. WARREN. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. I simply wanted to ask what the amendment was.

Mr. WARREN. The committee amendment strikes out the item altogether.

Mr. KENYON. I understood that.

Mr. WARREN. I want to put in place of the language "control of noxious rodents" the language "control of prairie dogs, gophers, and ground squirrels." That was the intention of the department; and there was a misunderstanding, the word "rodents" being understood to mean house rats, and so forth.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I notice that the phrase which the Senator seeks to amend reads "control of noxious rodents." It is followed by another which reads "destruction of predatory animals." I should like to inquire why we should control one set of animals and appropriate money to destroy another set? Just why should we control the prairie dog and destroy a predatory animal?

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator desire that it should read "destruction of" in both places?

Mr. THOMAS. I am opposed to it entirely, but I think the expression had better be "destruction of" these animals than "control of" them.

Mr. WARREN. I agree with the Senator entirely. I suggest that we strike out the words "control of noxious rodents" and make it read "destruction of prairie dogs, gophers, and ground squirrels."

Mr. THOMAS. I think it is a waste of money, myself. I think it will look better, however, if we destroy them instead of controlling them.

Mr. WARREN. I disagree with the Senator entirely as to the matter being uncalled for, because we are suffering immensely in certain sections with these rodents, as the Australian sheep and cattle men did many years ago with the rabbits. The department have found, and they have made a record of the fact, that as a result of joining with the States, counties, and citizens, and proceeding in a scientific way to poison these pests, they give instances in one case here—and I am quoting from an official document—where in one piece of 320 acres there were 1,641 prairie dogs killed in one day's work, that were piled up in the pile which the picture there shows, which were of course in addition to all of those that died in their holes. Now, in Wyoming, say at Evanston, at the grounds of the insane asylum, 22 acres, as the result of the work there under the direction of the Department of Agriculture agent, 383 prairie dogs were found dead after one day's work, beside those underneath the ground. I will say to the Senator that his State of Colorado is engaged now in this work, and is sending out to every lessee of land a letter giving him notice that if he wishes the further use of the land, if he wishes to again lease, he must join with the State of Colorado in exterminating these pests.

I think the amendment is a very useful one, and one that will save a great deal of grass. The fact is, that the ranges are growing smaller rather than larger, and the needs for beef, mutton, and wool are growing. These pests eat the grass away from the live stock. Very few of them, a dozen or perhaps a dozen and a half, eat and destroy more grass than a beef steer will eat. The losses in the United States are estimated as high as $150,000,000 a year, and the estimate given by the department here takes in the different States and gives the estimated loss in each State. I will say to the Senator that in cooperation with the State of Colorado I know of one concern that has already expended and contracted some $2,500 for this work. The trouble is in other localities, in the surrounding country, adjacent to the Government lands. Without the cooperation of the Government it avails little to kill them off, as they very soon come back from those localities which have not been cleared of the pest.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, my criticism was based upon the fact that the more money we appropriate for the destruction of pests of this kind the more pests there are. The more of these animals that are subject to be killed, the more animals remain to be killed. Wherever under a Government appropriation you kill one prairie dog, it would appear as though 10 or 15 come to his funeral.

I venture the prediction that 10 or 12 years from now we will still be appropriating money to destroy these pests, and that the usual report of the department about the vast destruction which is inflicted upon crops, and the reduction of live stock, and so forth, will be quite as potent for appropriations then as it is now. An item which once enters the Agricultural appropriation bill not only remains there for all time, but the thing at which it is aimed seems to flourish more greatly after appropriations are made to exterminate it than before that time.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the learned Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] said that wherever one prairie dog was killed 10 or 15 came to his funeral. I wish no higher number than 15 of the dogs came to the funeral.

Mr. THOMAS. I said that appears to be the case, if one could judge from the history of similar appropriations in the Agricultural bills for other pests.

Mr. ASHURST. I wish there were only 10 or 15 dogs to come to the funeral of a prairie dog. They come, however, by the thousands.

The prairie dog is one of the most interesting of all animals. They are gregarious; they build or dig towns for themselves. Amongst many of their strange characteristics is their method of entombing a rattlesnake. Rattlesnakes invade the home of a prairie dog to swallow the young dogs reposing in the bottom of the hole. The mother dog, upon returning from a foraging expedition and learning of the presence of a rattlesnake in the hole, gives a peculiar cry, and thereupon not 15 dogs come to the funeral, but thousands come, and they immediately seal up the hole, thereby entombing the snake. The rapidity with which this is done is remarkable.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. If the rattlesnake is the enemy of the young prairie dog, I would suggest that we ought to make an appropriation to encourage the propagation of rattlesnakes. [Laughter.]

Mr. ASHURST. It would be futile for me to attempt to measure powers of sarcasm with the brilliant Senator from Colorado, so I will adhere to my text.

Mr. President, the extermination of prairie dogs must be given some attention in a practical way. Each of these dog towns has a population of from 400 to 2,000 dogs. Their holes are dug from 20 to 60 feet down, and for a distance of 25 or 30 feet around each hole they remove all the grass. They not only eat the leaves and stems, but they eat out every root. Those who have seen prairie-dog towns vouch for the fact that there is not a single sprig of vegetation around that dog hole. In the State of Texas alone it is estimated that on one stretch of country there are 400,000,000 prairie dogs.

In one year 50 prairie dogs will destroy and uproot enough grass to sustain 1 sheep; 200 dogs will uproot and destroy—absolutely exterminate, root and branch—enough vegetation to sustain 1 cow. And when you reflect that in one part of Texas there are 400,000,000 prairie dogs, as estimated by the department—I am speaking now by the Agricultural Year Book—it will readily be seen that the prairie dog, a useless animal, doing no good to mankind, is destroying these grasses upon which we must depend to feed our cattle and sheep.

Now, Mr. President, a campaign was carried on in the State of Arizona last year out of a fund, part of which was provided by the State and part of which was provided by the Federal Government, and just in one morning 1,641 prairie dogs were killed. There is a photograph showing the great pile.

Mr. THOMAS. It is the same old photograph, is it not?

Mr. ASHURST. It is the same old photograph—pathetically true. The result of that campaign was that 6,117 cattle are now feeding on the lands rescued from these dogs. These dogs are not carnivorous. They and their kindred species, such as the gopher and ground squirrels, are herbiverous; and, as I said before, they tear up the grasses by the very roots.

In other words, the depredations of prairie dogs, ground squirrels, pocket gophers, jack rabbits, and other small rodents on grain and other crops cause annual losses exceeding $150,000,000 in value. In addition they destroy forage on the public ranges to an approximately equal amount.

To wit, $150,000,000, or a total destruction from these animals of $300,000,000 a year—

State officials in California estimate losses from this source at $30,000,000; in Montana, at $2,000,000; in North Dakota, from $6,000,000 to $9,000,000.

The Western States are urging increased cooperation on the part of the Government in controlling these losses as a food-conservation measure, and have put up more than $250,000, in addition to much material and the labor of many thousand farmers. The people of the West demand that the Government do its share, since more than half the lands are owned by the Government where these pests abound and invade the cultivated lands. They also vastly reduce the capacity of the public range for carrying live stock.

One cattleman near Flagstaff, Ariz., has stated that the prairie dogs have increased on his range to such an extent that they must be destroyed or he will be compelled to go out of the cattle business. He offered to expend $3,000, under the direction of the department expert, to free his range.

A small farming community in northern Arizona reported to have had an increase of $25,000 in its crop output last year as a result of a short spring campaign against prairie dogs.

The prairie dogs have been practically eliminated from about 700,000 acres of public lands and large areas of private lands in Arizona. As a result, the Government lands will now carry at least 6,000 head of cattle more than was possible previous to this work.

Sixteen thousand farmers cooperated in a campaign against ground squirrels in North Dakota last year and reported a saving in the grain output amounting to from $1,500,000 to $2,000,000 in value.

Prairie dogs exist in countless millions over an enormous area. From 30 to 50 prairie dogs will probably destroy forage sufficient to carry a sheep on the range, and from 150 to 200 prairie dogs will probably destroy forage sufficient to support a cow. It is estimated that if the western ranges were completely freed from prairie dogs that the increase in forage would support at least 1,000,000 head of cattle and 1,000,000 sheep more than is possible at present.

I have studied this subject a vast deal. I say again the prairie dog destroys the very grass, root, and branch upon which our cattle and our sheep must subsist. His peculiar gregarious habit is to live in a town and destroy all the grasses about; he even builds up a crater so that he may keep the rain out of the burrow; and he has a still further damaging habit of abandoning his home when near-by grasses are all eaten up. He does not go far away from his hole where other grasses are, but he abandons that home and digs another where grasses are found.

Mr. KENYON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. What effect has the Government work had in diminishing the number of these sociable dogs?

Mr. ASHURST. The work has been very effective. It has been supplemented by appropriations from the States. In my own State the carrying capacity of the ranges has increased 6,000 cattle by reason of the Government and the State appropriations. If all the prairie dogs were eliminated in my State, for example—and it is not overrun so badly as some other States—the carrying capacity of the ranges in Arizona would be increased 100,000 cattle; and if all the prairie dogs, except those kept in museums, were eliminated, the carrying capacity of the ranges of the whole country would be increased 1,000,000 cattle and 1,000,000 sheep.

Mr. KENYON. What are the States doing to remedy it?

Mr. WARREN. The United States is doing a small part of it when we consider the number of acres of Government land exposed to the dogs.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, as I have stated, I do not intend to oppose this amendment, for the very good reason that I know it is useless. I can not, however, refrain from making some comment upon the very luminous contribution to the subject by my friend the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST].

The prairie dog and the rattlesnake are indigenous to the soil of the plains. They were there when Columbus discovered America, and doubtless they were there for centuries prior to that event. They have flourished in their way, as wild animals do, and flourished without the necessity of any drastic governmental action, without materially interfering with the settlement of the country or the progress of industry.

Some time ago we began to appropriate money for their extermination, and the remarkable thing is that since that time they have not only increased and multiplied beyond the imagination, but they have also become a very dangerous element in the prosperity of the cattle and other grazing industries.

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator kindly pardon an interruption?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator says that a campaign of extermination has been started lately and that apparently the supply of prairie dogs has kept pace with the elimination. But let me explain it, and I do so by quoting from page 263 of the Agricultural Year Book of 1901:

The prarie dog is preeminently a social animal, living in colonies which vary in extent from a few acres to thousands of square miles and inhabited by thousands, and in some cases millions of animals. Colonies 20 to 30 miles in length are not rare, and in Texas one is known which measures about 250 miles one way by 100 to 150 the other, covering an area of about 25,000 square miles. The number of holes in use on each acre varies from a few to upward of a hundred and probably averages at least 25. At Alma, Nebr., W. H. Osgood found the number ranging from 35 to 64, and on an alfalfa field near Carlsbad, N. Mex., Vernon Bailey found 1,009 on 20 acres, or 50 to the acre. In old towns many holes are abandoned or used only as refuges, so that it is difficult to ascertain how many animals live in a stated number of holes. Another difficulty lies in the varying number of animals in the occupied holes, for in winter and early spring the usual number is 2 (a pair), while after the birth of the young the number is at least quadrupled and then decreases with the advance of the season, as the young are killed by enemies. It is certainly a conservative estimate to assume the average number of animals per acre to be 25. On this assumption, the number of prairie dogs in the great Texas colony must be at least 400,000,000.

Four hundred million alone in the State of Texas. So the Department of Agriculture says.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is that a census of the prairie dogs?

Mr. ASHURST. I can well imagine there might be a furtive one here or there that escaped the count, but they would not have escaped the eagle eye of the senior Senator from New York. The Government sent out experts who counted the holes. About four animals live in each hole. The births are by two, sometimes three, but very rarely above two. It would not require a careful man a very long time to estimate the number of dogs in one town. So I said 400,000,000. I may be a million or two off, but what is that among prairie dogs?

Mr. THOMAS. It is nothing in these days of billions.

Mr. ASHURST. Let me say that the Senator from New York is not without experience. He is a practical cattleman, and I believe he knows as well as I the pernicious effect upon the ranges of the prairie dog. He is a practical cattleman and knows as well as I do that they destroy grasses that ought to be consumed by cattle and sheep.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I do not want to do any injustice to the official gentlemen; I shall not do them an injustice intentionally, but I believe that the chief cause of the propagation of the prairie dog was the introduction of the first item of appropriation for its destruction. I believe that it has done more to stimulate his tendency to increase and multiply than all the white man's interference with his natural enemies. If there be 400,000,000 prairie dogs in Texas, barring a million or two one way or the other, I am unable to understand how you are going to destroy them with an appropriation of $100,000.

Mr. President, Texas is a very great State in itself but relatively a small portion of the western domain. There must be, again speaking without reference to the census that may have been taken in that and other States also, and I may say there are plenty of Government officials now to take prairie-dog censuses and do a great deal more work than they are doing here in Washington. There must be several million, say, roughly, a million and a half, prairie dogs in Colorado, New Mexico, Texas, Arizona, Wyoming, Montana, Utah, Idaho, and Nevada. This menace to the agricultural and live-stock interests of the country we propose to deal with by a paltry appropriation of $100,000. If it be true, as was stated by the Senator from Wyoming, that the prairie-dog plague is identical or largely so with the rabbit plague in Australia, then it follows that you can not exterminate them at all, and the only way to minimize the evil is to employ men who do nothing but shoot them day after day, and after dark if possible, and thus keep down the plague as much as can be done.

I do not think it is as bad as that, but I believe if this animal is multiplying so rapidly and interfering with our meat supply we ought to make an appropriation under which the Agricultural Department would be instructed to examine into and experiment upon the edible qualities of the priarie dog. It may be cheaper in other words for us to resort to the prairie dog as an article of diet than to spend these little, paltry driblets in trying to exterminate it, and thus increase our cattle to the extent of 6,000 a year or something of that sort.

It may be that they will be exterminated by this small appropriation, and that this tremendous menacing and overwhelming nuisance will be gotten rid of. If that is the case, I venture the assertion that the rattlesnake will then blossom forth. My experience is that they inhabit the holes of the priarie dogs. Whether they divide the rent I do not know, but they are always found together. We will begin through Federal appropriations a war of exterminations against the rattlesnake, and his multiplication will also be attributed to the white man who has destroyed his natural enemy, the prairie dog.

Of course, this appropriation is going through, but next year there are going to be more prairie dogs than this, and the year after that still more prairie dogs, and the appropriation will increase with the increase of the census of prairie dogs. It is money which, in my judgment, is wasted when it is applied to any such purpose.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, it would be impossible for anyone to try to add to the argument of ridicule that has been offered here by the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. I confess, from my observation of appropriations for something over 30 years in the two Houses of Congress, much of what the Senator from Colorado says is perfectly justified. But if he will think for a moment, and if the Senate will think for a moment, it will be realized that if from every farm in the State of Arizona there was eliminated every one of these rodents, these grass-destroying prairie dogs, and the Government lands and the Government reservations kept open, they would furnish a constant breeding ground. We must not only protect the farms of people who are unable on those farms to pay the great taxes that are necessary to carry on the State, but must go outside to protect five times the quantity of land they own, for there is not one-fifth of it in cultivation or in private ownership by reason of the great reservations made by the Government and the public lands still held by the Government in that State. I know myself I have gone miles and miles, and it seemed to me for hours, driving rapidly through a great prairie-dog town. When they abandon it they have left a desert just as complete as the floor of the Senate would be for the grazing of stock.

I am not in favor of the United States giving all the money required for the eradication of this pest. I am very much in favor of the United States giving in the eradication of this pest in my State according to the acreage it holds in proportion to the acreage of the people who are wanting to eliminate them.

For that reason I think that the people of the West are fully justified in asking the Government for aid. I have nothing to say about those States having no Government land within them.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to ask the Senator if it is not a fact that State funds are used in connection with Federal funds in this work.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I have no doubt of it. That is what I am saying. When the Government puts up in proportion to what the men themselves will put up, according to the land the Government holds and occupies and according to the land that the citizen holds and occupies in the State, it seems to me it will be perfectly fair.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask permission at this point to insert a statement by the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, Hon. Clarence Ousley, of Texas, showing the nature of this work and certain other work of the department. Mr. Ousley prepared this statement at my request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, July 17, 1918.

Senator MORRIS SHEPPARD,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR SHEPPARD: In reply to your letter of July 15, I have noted the criticisms in the Senate regarding the research work of the Department of Agriculture, and I take this opportunity of pointing out, at your request, the true situation.

Adverse comment has been made upon the Bureau of Chemistry's investigation of oysters and on the Bureau of Biological Survey's warfare against coyotes and other predatory animals.

BUREAU OF CHEMISTRY.

The work done under our appropriation for oyster investigations is for the purpose of finding out the best ways of insuring that the oysters which are put upon the market will not be contaminated by sewage pollution and that they will not be adulterated by the process known as "soaking."

It has been recognized for a long time that the eating of raw oysters produced in waters contaminated by sewage from large cities constitutes a very grave menace to the public health. Epidemics of typhoid fever have been traced directly to banquets where such oysters have been served. Senator PENROSE apparently overlooked the fact, when he referred to our prehistoric ancestors partaking of oysters, that they did not have to take their oysters from waters which had been polluted by the sewage from such large cities as now exist on our seaboards.

As a result of the work which the Bureau of Chemistry has done, in cooperation with the Public Health Service, under the small appropriation for oyster investigations, the shipment into interstate commerce of oysters from beds which are polluted by sewage has been eliminated. Furthermore, as a result of the work which we have done along this line many of the larger cities and States have taken steps to prevent the sale of polluted oysters within their jurisdictions.

Surveys have been made of many oyster beds along the Atlantic coast, and those beds which have been polluted by sewage have been marked out and no oysters are permitted to be sold in many jurisdictions from those beds.

Another result of these investigations has been that many cities are taking steps to prevent their waters and oyster beds from becoming polluted from their sewage.

It was in the past a rather common practice in the oyster trade to soak oysters in fresh water. This caused the oysters to increase in bulk about 20 per cent. Four quarts of oysters, after being soaked in fresh water, will fill a five-quart measure. In other words, the oyster dealer can take four quarts of oysters and by soaking them sell them for five quarts.

It is due to the research work of the Bureau of Chemistry and the activities of the Department of Agriculture that under modern conditions, this important article of food comes to the ordinary table in wholesome condition and as an honest product.

The Bureau of Chemistry has rendered and is rendering service of incalculable value in the production of American dyes and dyestuffs; in improved methods for handling, packing, storing, and shipping poultry, eggs, and fish to prevent deterioration and spoilage; in methods of the manufacture of cane sirup by which a clear light-colored sirup can be made by producers with a small factory equipment; in the prevention of grain-dust explosions in thrashers and flour mills that heretofore have caused fires entailing annual losses of millions of dollars; and, as was shown in the recent inquiry by the Senate Committee on Agriculture, the bureau's research work in charcoal and gases has been of very great value to the War Department.

BUREAU OF BIOLOGICAL SURVEY.

The Department of Agriculture has developed effective methods of destroying prairie dogs, ground squirrels, jack rabbits, and like pests that cause losses to field crops and forage amounting to more than $300,000,000 annually. The State Council of Defense of New Mexico and the Arizona Legislature at a recent war session have appropriated $25,000 each to be expended in such campaigns against noxious rodents and predatory animals, in cooperation with equal expenditures by the department. California has allotted $60,000 for use on State lands; Nevada, $35,000; Utah, $35,000. In North Dakota 33,000 farmers are cooperating under the leadership of department experts in a ground-squirrel campaign, covering more than 13,000,000 acres; in Montana, 18,000 farmers are engaged in a similar campaign.

The Government lands of the West are the chief haunts of these pests, and a just demand is made by the States that the department destroy the rodents on public lands about cultivated areas and supply experts to guide community campaigns elsewhere. Many millions of dollars' worth of grain and other food crops will be saved by the work now in progress, and the amount can be greatly increased if necessary funds are available.

House rats destroy more than $200,000,000 worth of foodstuffs and other property each year in the United States. This more than equals the economic output of 200,000 men working continuously. These losses can be greatly reduced by rat proofing and other community measures. The importance of rat control for food-saving purposes is recognized by the United States Food Administration and the National Council of Defense. Many State and local campaigns are being organized to control rats, and the department is constantly asked for assistance in this work. Many applications are received also for assistance in controlling these pests in Army and Navy supply depots, in manufacturing establishments, flour mills, and other business establishments and on farms.

Predatory animals, including wolves, coyotes, mountain lions, and bobcats destroy more than $20,000,000 worth of live stock annually. The campaign of the department for the destruction of these pests has the indorsement and active cooperation of stock growers and others in the West. The department hunters have taken nearly 65,000 of these stock-killing animals, including 1,685 large wolves, 7,288 bobcats, and 53,877 coyotes, and have killed by poison about an equal number of coyotes in addition, with a resulting annual saving of more than $5,000,000 worth of meat. The skins taken by the department hunters approximate $140,000 in value, of which those already sold have brought $121,944 into the United States Treasury.

The bounty system of controlling noxious animals has caused the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars, without in a single case having secured any permanent relief. The campaign conducted by the Department of Agriculture is aimed at permanently eliminating these pests. The results already obtained have been so definite that the bounty system is being generally abandoned in favor of this new method.

The bounty system to which Senator PENROSE alluded has been abandoned in all States where intelligent study has been given to the subject, because experience proves that it induces the killing of animals only to the point where the hunt ceases to be profitable and leaves a sufficient number to breed again. The department's methods aim at the destruction of the pest in a given area.

BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY.

It was the research work conducted by the Bureau of Animal Industry that resulted in the determination of the cause of Texas fever and the method of its transmission through the agency of the cattle tick. This was the first experimental proof that disease can be carried from one animal to another by intermediary hosts, such as flies, mosquitoes, lice, fleas, rats, etc. This discovery made possible the application of the practicable methods now used so successfully in the extermination of the cattle tick in the South. It made possible the prevention of at least $40,000,000 in lossess annually resulting from the cattle tick; it made possible the development of a great live-stock and dairy industry in the South; it led to the further discovery that mosquitoes are the carriers of the infection of malaria and yellow fever, and this knowledge resulted in effective measures against these diseases and made possible the construction of the Panama Canal.

The research work of the Bureau of Animal Industry established the fact that the disease hog cholera is caused by an invisible nonfilterable virus. This knowledge was of great advantage in the further study of the disease, which resulted in the discovery by the bureau of a serum that is effective in protecting hogs from hog cholera and can be produced at a small cost. The treatment with this serum is the only treatment that has proved effective against this disease, which in the past has produced losses estimated at $60,000,000 annually. The rapid diminution of losses of swine from disease since the discovery of this serum is evidenced by the statistics, which show that in the United States the losses per thousand have dropped from 118 in the year 1913 to 42 in the year ending April 1, 1918. During the past year, when it was so necessary to increase pork production, it was found that great numbers of immature hogs were being sent to the public market for slaughter. Although these animals were exposed to infection during transit and handling through stockyards, the application of the serum treatment made it possible to save hundreds of thousands of these hogs and permit them to be returned to farms for development and fattening. It is no exaggeration to say that the antihog-cholera serum discovered through the research work of the Bureau of Animal Industry has already resulted in a saving of many millions of dollars to the people of the United States.

In like manner the Bureau of Animal Industry has reduced the ravages of blackleg in cattle, glanders, and various other animal diseases.

In the fiscal year 1917 the Bureau of Animal Industry expended $160,000 for labels to mark meats after they had been inspected and passed. No other satisfactory means of marking inspected meat was known except poisonous substances be used. When the meat-inspection service was extended under the act of June 30, 1906, it was found that the labels for marking meat would cost approximately $500,000 per annum. In 1907 Dorset discovered a harmless ink, which, when used with a metal stamp and pad, gave equally good results as the labels, and the maximum cost was not over $3,000 per annum.

The fact was developed by the Zoological Division of the bureau that trichinæ in pork, which cause a serious and commonly fatal disease of human beings, can be destroyed by retrigerating the pork for 20 days at a temperature of 5° F. The exact degree of heat required to kill trichinæ in cooking pork was also determined, and methods for curing meat have been established that will destroy the vitality of the trichinæ in pork. These are matters that are of considerable importance from a public-health point of view.

The research work of the experiment station of the Bureau of Animal Industry established some important facts in connection with tuberculosis. For instance, that public health must be protected against products obtained from tuberculous animals, and that the products most commonly infected are milk, cream, butter, and cream cheese. It was further shown that such products can be made harmless by sterilization; that tubercle bacilli do not occur in the circulating blood of tuberculous animals unless in advanced stages of the disease, which proved that the meat-inspection regulations regarding the disposition of tuberculous animals are sound and reasonable; that the most common mode by which tuberculous animals disseminate tubercle bacilli is via their bowels with their feces; that apparently healthy tuberculous cows may for this reason be exceedingly dangerous; that the tubercle bacilli expelled via the bowels are derived from open tuberculous lesions in the lungs, throat, or intestine, and that they do not reach the bowels via the blood or lymph stream; that the infected feces of cattle is one of the most common causes of tuberculosis of hogs; that tuberculosis among hogs is almost invariably due to infection derived from cattle, and therefore the disease could be eliminated from hogs if they were protected against tubercle bacilli which have their origin in tuberculous cattle; that the dangers associated with the practice of bovo-vaccination against tuberculosis are so great that this mode of treatment is not considered safe and practically has been abandoned. The knowledge thus acquired concerning tuberculosis is proving of great economic advantage in the efforts being made to control this disease, which produces a loss to the country estimated at $25,000,000 annually.

Like research has been conducted in regard to contagious abortion with highly satisfactory results and a rich promise of still greater developments in the near future.

The department's activities in regard to cottage cheese were also criticized. The Dairy Division of the Bureau of Animal Industry has developed new and valuable methods for making cottage cheese, cream cheese, and Neufchatel cheese under both farm and factory conditions, which insure a uniform product of high quality. It has been shown that, contrary to the belief of Neufchatel and cream cheese manufacturers, a perfectly satisfactory cheese can be made from pasteurized milk. The bureau has worked out the biological and chemical factors concerned in the ripening of Camembert cheese and the methods of control of the manufacturing and curing conditions necessary for proper ripening. By the use of these methods Camembert cheese equal to the imported product is being made in this country.

BUREAU OF PLANT INDUSTRY.

As a result of research and investigation by the Bureau of Plant Industry, Crimean wheats have been widely introduced in the Great Plains and west of the Rocky Mountains, and the Durum wheat industry, now exceeding 40,000,000 bushels annually, has been established. Increased yields of oats, due to the same methods by the Bureau of Plant Industry, are safely reckoned at from $10,000,000 to $20,000,000 annually. In the dry regions of the Southwest, feterita, dwarf milo, dwarf kafir, and other grain sorghums have been increased from 2,000,000 acres in 1910 to 4,000,000 acres in 1916, with a gross increment of value of at least $20,000,000. The early introduction of the Washington navel orange, which has been the basis of the orange industry of California, is the first conspicuous plant introduction through Federal channels.

New types of upland cotton, superior in cultural characters and quality of fiber, have been discovered in weevil-infested regions of Central America, acclimated and established in cultivation in the United States. The value of the Durango cotton grown this year is over $1,000,000, but the potential value of a superior type might be placed in hundreds of millions.

Two new varieties of Egyptian cotton, adapted to irrigated agriculture in the Southwest, have been originated and are being commercially grown in Arizona. Both are in great demand among spinners, especially of automobile-tire fabrics.

The extension of the peanut industry into weevil-infested cotton regions of the South has resulted in the establishment of an industry estimated at an annual value of $20,000,000. A permanent peanut-oil industry seems almost certain to be established as a corollary to the extension of the crop in these States.

The proper housing and curing of sweet potatoes in the Southern States, due to the work of the department, has resulted in the marketing of hundreds of thousands of bushels of potatoes previously largely lost to human consumption.

The activities of the bureau in eradicating or controlling plant diseases are frequently local in character, since climatic conditions, methods of culture, and methods of handling and storage, frequently are factors of almost as great importance as the presence of the disease organism. Among the important activities of recent years may be mentioned:

It has been demonstrated that seed treatment will not prevent the occurrence of bunt or stinking smut of wheat in the Pacific Northwest until the smut organism is eliminated from the soil. Studies in the relation of temperature and moisture to germination of smut spores have shown the real value of early fall or late summer planting. A combination of seed treatment and soil management will doubtless control bunt in the Pacific Northwest. The saving that has resulted from application of methods of control of stinking smut throughout the United States amounts to approximately $55,000,000.

Practical methods of actually preventing oat smut have been improved, to the end that if generally applied by farmers a net saving of $50,000,000 would result.

Wilt-resistant varieties of cotton are grown on many thousands of farms. Twelve selected growers in South Carolina saved $12,000 in one year by planting Dixie, as compared with previous experiences with other kinds of cotton.

The breeding and distribution of varieties of cowpeas resistant to wilt and root knot has made possible the retention of this crop over large areas, where it would otherwise have been abandoned.

BUREAU OF ENTOMOLOGY.

Hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of wheat have been saved from the ravages of the Hessian fly during the past 10 years by making it possible to distribute information relative to safe dates for planting and warnings regarding impending outbreaks of this pest.

Many millions of bushels of corn have been saved from destruction by the chinch bug during the same period by simple trapping methods perfected as a result of the investigations of this bureau.

Remedies have been developed for the control of the Mediterranean flour moth, the general adoption of which has reduced this insect to a pest of minor importance. Formerly it was the chief source of loss in mills and elevators. The reports of this department have been republished in all mill and grain papers of the United States.

Control measures developed by this bureau for the onion thrips have, on the authority of Hon. Henry A. Barnhart, in a statement before the House Agricultural Committee, saved the farmers of his district in one year more than $1,000,000.

The gipsy and brown-tail moths have been confined to portions of New England, and all outbreaks outside of this area have been completely cleaned up. Within the area effective control has been maintained by direct methods—spraying, banding, etc., and by the introduction from Europe and Asia of large numbers of parasites which have been freed and distributed throughout the infested district by hundreds of thousands.

The fumigation method of protecting citrus trees in California from scale and other insects has been standardized, with a great increase in the efficiency of the method; and in Florida the white fly and the various scale enemies of citrus trees are being controlled by efficient sprays, devised as a result of careful experimentation of this bureau.

In beekeeping the causes of three important bee diseases have been discovered, and effective methods of prevention have been worked out and are now being generally adopted by beekeepers. Practical methods of wintering have also been devised which have resulted not only in reducing the loss of bees in the winter, but in increasing the honey crop from such colonies the following year.

The Bureau of Entomology has just succeeded, after many years of constant study and observation, in evolving a plan of control of the cotton-boll weevil, which has cost the United States untold millions during the last 15 or 20 years.

I have mentioned only the outstanding accomplishments of the Department of Agriculture through research. It is a fair statement that there is not a farm in the United States to-day, not an orchard nor a garden nor a flock of animals—indeed, it would not be too much to say that there is not a plant or an animal of use or beauty in the United States to-day that has not in some degree, through the control of pests or diseases in the process of its breeding or in the process of its maintenance, that is not benefited by the research work of the Department of Agriculture and the agricultural colleges with which the department is associated. The economies effected, the losses saved, and the production increased by the activities of any one of the bureaus I have named will every year more than pay the entire cost of maintaining the Department of Agriculture.

Very truly, yours,

CLARENCE OUSLEY,
Assistant Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the committee, on page 9, in line 20, to strike out the words "control of noxious rodents, $100,000."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask unanimus consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside to permit the consideration of the conference report on the new draft bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-seven Senators having answered to their names there is a quorum present.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I present to the Senate and ask for the immediate consideration of the conference report on House bill 12731.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12731) amending the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate insert the following:

"That the second sentence of section 2 of the act entitled 'An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States,' approved May 18, 1917, as amended, be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"Persons engaged in industries, occupations, or employments, including agriculture, found to be necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment or the effective operation of the military forces or the maintenance of national interest during the emergency.

"SEC. 3. That section 5 of said act be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"That all male persons between the ages of 18 and 45, both inclusive, shall be subject to registration in accordance with regulations to be prescribed by the President, and, upon proclamation by the President or other public notice given by him or by his direction stating the time or times and place or places of any such registration, it shall be the duty of all persons of the designated ages, except officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army; officers and enlisted men of the National Guard while in the service of the United States; officers of the Officers' Reserve Corps and enlisted men in the Enlisted Reserve Corps while in the service of the United States; officers and enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps; officers and enlisted and enrolled men of the Naval Reserve Force and Marine Corps Reserve while in the service of the United States; officers commissioned in the Army of the United States under the provisions of this act; persons who, prior to any day set for registration by the President hereunder, have registered under the terms of this act or under the terms of the resolution entitled 'Joint resolution providing for the registration for military service of all male persons citizens of the United States and all male persons residing in the United States who have, since the 5th day of June, 1917, and on or before the day set for the registration by proclamation by the President, attained the age of 21 years, in accordance with such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe under the terms

They shall likewise be eligible to admission to officers' schools under such rules and regulations as may be adopted for entrance to such schools, but shall not be barred therefrom or discriminated against on account of age.

"SEC. 7. That the Secretary of War is authorized to assign to educational institutions, for special and technical training, soldiers who enter the military service under the provisions of this act in such numbers and under such regulations as he may prescribe; and is authorized to contract with such educational institutions for the subsistence, quarters, and military and academic instruction of such soldiers.

"SEC. 8. "SEC. 9. That hereafter, uniforms, accouterments, and equipment shall, upon the request of any officer of the Army or cadet at the Military Academy, be furnished by the Government at cost, subject to such restrictions and regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe."

G. M. HITCHCOCK,
F. E. WARREN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

S. H. DENT, Jr.,
W. J. FIELDS,
JULIUS KAHN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I assume that the conference report is now before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As the Chair understands, the Senator from Oregon moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I make that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the Senate proceed to the consideration of the report?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it seems to me the Senator from Oregon ought not to make that motion, but that such action should be taken by unanimous consent, as we are acting under a unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask—I do not know whether or not I can even do that—that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That has already been done.

Mr. GORE. I was not aware of that, having been called out of the Chamber.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request for unanimous consent made by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]? There being none, the conference report is before the Senate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I desire to make a very brief statement in reference to the conference report in order that the Senate may know just what the conferees have done in the matter. If Senators have before them the House bill as it was reported out of the Committee on Military Affairs originally, I can tell them from that just what changes were made by the conferees in the bill.

The first provision of the bill as reported by the Senate committee has been adopted by the conferees without change.

Section 2 of the bill as reported by the committee has been adopted by the conferees, except that what is known as the "work-or-fight" proviso and the proviso which is known as the Penrose amendment were entirely stricken from the section.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon explain what the Penrose amendment was? I have forgotten it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Penrose amendment provided—

That the local boards shall determine in the first instance from the answers in the questionnaire of each registrant whether or not any person is entitled to deferment or exemption without requiring registrants to claim such deferred classification or such exemption.

Section 3 of the bill as reported by the Senate committee, which authorized the transfer of members of a local board in one State to another board in the same State, was stricken out. The House and the Senate conferees were at cross-purposes with reference to that provision, and also with reference to the provision in the House bill for the appointment of inspectors to inspect, practically with authority to suggest changes of, the findings of the local boards, so both provisions were stricken from the bill.

Section 4 of the bill as reported, and which is known as the 18 to 45 draft provision, was taken by the conferees in full as it was adopted by the House of Representatives and by the Senate.

Section 5 of the bill as reported by the Senate committee was adopted in full.

Section 6 as reported to the Senate, the provision having reference to the wife of a soldier or sailor serving in the present war not being disqualified for any appointment or position under the Government because she is a married woman, was slightly modified by the conferees, although the sense of it is exactly the same. Senators will see the slight change which was made, though the effect of it is not changed.

Section 7 of the bill as reported by the Senate committee was slightly changed, but without changing its effect.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The section to which the Senator refers originally provided that sailors, as well as soldiers, should have the chance to get commissions, and I see that the conference report has eliminated the sailor part of it. Why was that done?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. We were assured, Mr. President, by the House conferees that any attempt on the part of the Military Committee of either body to interfere with men in the Navy was resented by the House Committee on Naval Affairs; that if the Naval Committee desired to make any change themselves, in order to follow the provisions of this act, they could do it in a subsequent act. That was the only reason for the elimination of that language.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. There are other provisions in the bill in reference to the Army and Navy and the Marine Corps. Of course, I accept what the Senator from Oregon says as the fact, but it seems to me that to discriminate against the sailors and to relegate the matter to a subsequent bill to be brought in by the Committee on Military Affairs is very unfortunate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. We thought it unfortunate, but the Members of the House of Representatives were very insistent about that. Without mentioning any names of the Members of the Naval Committee of the House, we thought it was wise, in view of the necessity of getting this bill through as soon as we could, to comply with the wishes of the House in that respect.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. Before the Senator proceeds with the next provision, may I ask him to give the reasons which induced the Senate Members of the conference to yield to the House demands on the so-called "work or fight" provision?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have no objection to outlining to the Senator from Colorado the views of the conferees, but I understand——

Mr. THOMAS. Assuming, of course, that the Senator is at liberty to speak in reference to the matter.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Of course, I have nothing to conceal from the Senate nor from the country with reference to that, but, Mr. President, I should like first to finish this short statement, and then I will answer the Senator's question.

Mr. THOMAS. That is perfectly agreeable to me.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, section 7 of the bill as reported by the Senate committee, as I stated a while ago, providing that soldiers, "regardless of age, when they are accepted as volunteers or when they shall have been drafted shall be eligible to receive commissions," and so forth, was in substance, adopted by the conferees, though in a slightly different form. We thought we clarified the situation by using language which Senators will find in the conference report. It shortens the provisions somewhat but does not change the effect of it. The Senate provision, however, in the main was adopted.

Section 8 of the bill as reported to the Senate was disagreed to by the conferees. That is the section which is known as the school section. In place of that provision we adopted the House section, which provides for the special and technical training of young men in the Army at this time, instead of looking to the future, and providing for their tuition when they return from the war.

Section 9 of the bill as reported to the Senate was adopted, but slightly changed. It will be remembered that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] offered his amendment, which is known as the Fall amendment, as an addition to another section. Later his amendment was put in as a separate section at his suggestion or at the suggestion of some other Senator. In order to clarify it a little, we adopted the following language:

SEC. 8. That any person, under the age of 21, who has served or shall hereafter serve in the Army of the United States during the present emergency, shall be entitled to the same rights under the homestead and other land and mineral entry laws, general or special, as those over 21 years of age now possess under said laws.

Mr. FALL. If the Senator from Oregon will permit me, the only difference is that having been intended to be attached to another section, the first words in the amendment as originally drawn, "That any such person," have been changed so as to make it fit as at present placed in the bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That was the only purpose of the change.

Now, I want to say in reference to that section, Mr. President, that it will be noticed by examining the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of yesterday that the question was raised by some Members of the House as to whether or not the provision as adopted by the Senate would not open the door to a misappropriation of public lands or possibly of imposition on boys under 21 who went into the service. That, of course, as all Senators know, was furthest from the intention of the Senator from New Mexico or of any of the Senators who were in favor of the adoption of the amendment; but in view of the fact that the question has been raised, after consultation with the Senator from New Mexico and with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], we have framed a joint resolution, which I am going to present to the Senate a little later, which will be reported out favorably by a majority of the Public Lands Committee of the Senate, and which I shall ask the Senate to pass immediately after the adoption of the conference report, so as to remove any question about the matter.

The Senator from New Mexico was glad to do that, and all of us want to arrange it so that there will be no question as to what this section means. In due course I will read the joint resolution, or will ask the Secretary to read it, and present the report of the Committee on Public Lands in connection with it; and, as I have said, I am going to ask, as soon as the conference report is adopted, that the resolution may be adopted, so that it may be construed in connection with the law itself.

Section 10 in the bill as passed by the Senate had reference to officers' uniforms, being the amendment known as the Jones amendment, or possibly the Smith amendment, in this bill, but it is an amendment which the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] has heretofore introduced and which has passed the Senate a number of times. While it was changed somewhat in phraseology, the purpose and effect of the amendment as adopted by the conferees is the same.

I will say further that there were a number of provisions in the House bill, which the House was quite insistent upon having put into this bill, which we declined to have go in. Amongst others was section 2 of the House bill, providing for the drafting of cobelligerent aliens. That provision was inserted upon the floor of the House, but it was strenuously objected to by the State Department and by the War Department as well, and after discussion between the representatives of those departments and the conferees that section was stricken from the bill.

I believe, Mr. President, that I have stated, or attempted to state, the changes which were made in the measure. The substantial matters which were left out of the bill as agreed upon by the conferees were the provisions known as the "work-or-fight" amendment—the Thomas amendment, with the Cummins amendment attached—the so-called Penrose amendment, and an amendment providing for a badge of some kind to be worn by those engaged in essential industries. Those three provisions were practically the only things which were left out of the Senate bill.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] asked me a while ago to state why the "work-or-fight" provision was left out of the bill. After discussions in conference—and they followed the line of similar discussions which we had in the Senate upon the same proposition—the conferees, in view of the attitude of the House of Representatives upon this provision and in view of the attitude of the conferees upon the part of the House, concluded that the things which were sought to be accomplished by the Thomas amendment—the "work-or-fight" provision—can be accomplished now by the President under the original draft act. The Senate knows I favored the "work-or-fight" provision, and I have so stated publicly and to those who represent the labor organizations, but after reading again the provision of the original draft act, which provides, in substance, that when the cause for the exemption ceases the exemption itself shall cease, and the regulations that have been adopted under that provision of the existing law, I believe the Executive authority has the power now to do just exactly what the Thomas amendment proposes to do; in other words, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado would not confer any further or greater power than the Executive, the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, has at this time. That was the reason the conferees struck it out. The House had voted 2 to 1 against the adoption of the provision.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. Did not the Thomas amendment require that this be done, while under the present law is it not merely discretionary as to whether it shall be done?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think it is discretionary under the so-called Thomas amendment, for the President is authorized to adopt rules and regulations for carrying out the provisions of that amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; but he can not adopt rules and regulations for not carrying it out; the only rules and regulations which he could adopt would be rules and regulations to carry out affirmative legislation on the part of Congress.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Well, possibly the Senator's construction of it is right, but my own construction, after having favored the amendment and having voted for it, and after having read again the provision in the law as it stands to-day, and the regulations covering the subject, was that the amendment did not give any greater power than the President now has; in other words, under the present law the President can do what the Thomas amendment proposed if he sees fit to do so, whereas, even if the Thomas amendment were adopted and he did not see fit to take the course outlined, he could adopt regulations which would prevent enforcement of the amendment. I may be wrong in my construction of it, but that is my view.

Now, with reference to the Penrose amendment. Senators are familiar with the questionnaire. We were assured by Col. Warren, of the Judge Advocate General's department, who has had more to do, I believe, with the draft act than anybody connected with the department, with the possible exception of Gen. Crowder, that the adoption of the Penrose amendment would lead to the changes which are indicated in the questionnaire which I hold in my hand [exhibiting], a large number of which have already been printed, packed, and started to their destination. It would have required the reprinting of this questionnaire—Senators can see the changes indicated in blue pencil—and it would have cost several hundred thousand dollars, as we were informed, because to get these questionnaires before the people takes over 17,000,000 pieces of literature, much of which has already been printed.

Furthermore, the Provost Marshal General advised us that the question of exemption under present regulations has become a settled policy in every little community in the country that the people thoroughly understand; they have been educated up to it and know just exactly what the questionnaire means and what they are expected to answer with reference to it. To adopt a different policy now, he assured us, would require the reeducation of people upon a subject that they were already advised about and seemed to be satisfied with.

In addition to that, under the rules and regulations of the Provost Marshal General's office, the cases of those who register and those who do not register, and even those who do not answer the questionnaire and those who do not claim exemption, are treated by the local boards just as though they had acted in the premises and answered all of the questions.

The War Department is going even further with reference to that. The Provost Marshal General assured us that it is the purpose of the department to furnish each district board with three advisers. They can only be advisers, and they have no power to do more than advise, but in the registration of thirteen, fourteen, or fifteen million men under the present draft the district boards will need advice and will probably need assistance. It is proposed to furnish to each district board three advisers, one recommended by the Department of Labor, one recommended by the Department of Agriculture, and the third appointed by the district board itself. It will be the function of these men to assist the district board in making the classifications. For instance, it will be assumed that the representative of the Department of Labor will know what the essential industries require in the way of exemption of men. In other communities which are distinctly agricultural the representative of the Agricultural Department will be presumed to know what the conditions are as to labor in the agricultural sections, and the third man will know locally the attitude of the public mind and conditions generally.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if the service that these advisers are to render is to be purely advisory?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is to be purely advisory.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And they will have no authority in law?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Absolutely none.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They will come entirely through the presidential regulation?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. They will act on the application and request of the district board. If the district board does not want them, they can not act.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator recalls that we had rather an animated debate on the question of shifting the board members from one community to another. Does that provision remain in the bill?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No; that provision has been stricken out.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And these men will act in a purely advisory capacity?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is all. Let me say to the Senator that the regulation has not been finally adopted; it has been prepared by the Provost Marshal General and was read to the members of the committee, but it is yet to meet the approval of the Secretary of War. It was thought by the Provost Marshal General that it would be approved yesterday. In any event, I will undertake to find out whether it has been approved, and will be glad to submit it as a part of the record.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator also state the fact that the advisers to whom he has referred are to have access to all the papers of the local boards and are to cooperate with them equally with the district board?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But the functions of the local board remain unimpaired?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Absolutely.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, from where is this expert agent to be selected?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not recall that there is anything in the regulations that provides as to that.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, is it understood that he is to be called from the same district in which the local board operates?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. As I have said, the regulation was read to us hastily, and I did not analyze it carefully. I do not recall that it fixed where his habitat should be.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, will the Senator inform the Senate how many districts there are and how much of an army it would require to fulfill this requirement?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. My recollection is about 165.

Mr. McCUMBER. One hundred and sixty-five districts?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Something like that; yes, sir.

Mr. McCUMBER. It simply means, then, that the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of Labor will select 165 men who will be regarded as experts and send them to the 165 districts without reference to where they hail from?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think so; only the Senator has not the number quite large enough. It would be twice 165, if I have the number of districts in my mind correctly.

Mr. McCUMBER. I thought the Senator said 165 districts.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes. The Department of Labor selects one and the Department of Agriculture another. So the Senator would have to multiply the 165 by 2. Then, there is one man who is to be locally selected by the district boards themselves.

Mr. McCUMBER. So that the total number would be three times 165?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Three times that; yes, sir.

Mr. President, I will endeavor to get from the Provost Marshal General that regulation if it has been finally adopted, but I have stated the substance of it as I recall it.

There was one other amendment which was proposed by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] with reference to supplying those engaged in essential industries who were within the draft age with some sort of distinguishing badge. That amendment the committee did not think necessary at this time. I may say that one of the conferees stated that that had been attempted locally in one State and it had been found not to work well; that the badge was subject to transfer from one to another, and it was used for purposes not intended. I suppose that a penalty might be attached to the use of it by anyone other than the person who is entitled to it; but in any event, in view of the emergency, the conferees thought it just as well to leave it out.

I think I have stated, as far as I can recall them, the changes that were made in the bill.

In order that the Senate may be advised about it, I report and ask the Secretary to read the joint resolution to which reference has been made. I will present the report contemporaneously with the bill itself for the information of the Senate and ask the Secretary to read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the joint resolution.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 169) regulating the operation of section 8 of the act entitled "An act amending the act entitled 'An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States,' approved May 18, 1917," was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That no relinquishment of any public-land entry made under and by authority of section 8 of the act passed at the second session of the Sixty-fifth Congress entitled "An act amending the act entitled 'An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States,' approved May 18, 1917," shall be valid or effective for any purpose unless executed after the entryman shall have resided upon and cultivated the land, in the case of a homestead entry for at least six months, and in the case of an entry made under other than the homestead laws after the entryman shall have complied with the provisions of the applicable law for at least one year.

Any person, firm, or corporation soliciting or dealing with the relinquishment of such claim or entry prior to the completion of one year's compliance with the applicable law and with this resolution, and who or which solicits, demands, or receives or accepts any fee or compensation for locating, filing, or securing any claim or entry for any person entitled to the benefits of said section shall, upon conviction, be fined not to exceed $1,000 or imprisonment for not exceeding two years, or both.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I make this report from the Committee on Public Lands at this time merely for the information of the Senate and not for its consideration. I shall ask the Senate to consider the joint resolution immediately after the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I had that joint resolution presented to me just a few minutes ago, with the request that I sign the approval of it as a member of the Committee on Public Lands. I must confess that what action should be taken on this joint resolution is decidedly uncertain as far as my mind is concerned. I recognize the mischief which is sought to be reached by the joint resolution, but I am fearful that the consequences of the remedy proposed far outweigh the mischief sought to be remedied.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator for just a moment? Did the Senator want to discuss the joint resolution? If so, I should like to have the report adopted, and then the joint resolution can be discussed afterwards.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I want to discuss it now, because, as the Senator from Oregon says, it is directly related to the bill which is now before us in this conference report.

The provision in the conference report is that those brought within the draft under 21 years of age may make public-land entries to the same extent as if they were 21 years of age, and they are entitled to six months after their return from the war in which to make actual entry upon the land. That is the privilege granted.

I am satisfied that when the amendment to the bill was originally presented here none of us thought that it was conferring any privilege which was not already conferred upon one who was 21 years of age; or, in other words, we supposed we were giving to those between 18 and 21 the same privileges with reference to the public lands as those above 21, and the purpose of it was decidedly commendable. There can be no question about that. The motive behind this thing is highly commendable. It now occurs to somebody—I believe the suggestion has come from the General Land Office—that unless there be some restrictions upon relinquishments these boys will be induced to make entries upon public lands, and there will be great speculation in their relinquishments while they are members of the Army. I must confess that that is a situation which may be productive of very great injury in some sections of the West, and probably it ought to be met somehow; but the question in my mind is whether or not the proposed remedy is the correct one.

This joint resolution absolutely prevents one of these boys from ever making a relinquishment until after he shall have resided upon the land for a period of six months, in case residence is required; and, with respect to those cases where no residence is required, it defers the time when a relinquishment may become valid until six months after he has complied with the law in reference to it. What does that mean? It means that everyone of these boys who makes an entry upon the public domain has a right while he is in the Army and for six months thereafter to keep that land in reserve, with no power under any circumstances to relinquish it.

What will probably be the effect of that? Take the cattleman upon the public domain who owns his ranches here and there—a familiar situation in the western country. He wants to tie up that range. How easy it is for him to do it. He can go to these boys, 18, 19, 20 years of age, and tell them to make this entry. It is not necessary for them to make it for the benefit of the cattleman, but the boy makes it for his own benefit, with the result that all the time he is in the war that land is tied up, and might just as well be in the ownership of the cattleman, and settlement and progress in all such communities are absolutely stopped.

Do you want that sort of a situation? I think these boys ought to have all the rights and privileges of a man 21 years of age. I think they have them without this joint resolution; and I would rather leave the situation as it is under the Fall amendment than to have coupled with it this joint resolution. I would rather take my chances upon speculation in relinquishments than the other kind of speculation, and a worse speculation, to enable a few men to monopolize the public domain and absolutely prevent progress during the war.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to call the Senator's attention to another provision of the amendment. It provides, as I remember, that in the case of a homestead the soldier can not be allowed to relinquish it until after he has resided on the land six months. Suppose the soldier completes his service in the Army but never goes on the land. Would it not tie it up forever?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I was going to suggest that further difficulty with the joint resolution. Under this joint resolution there is no way by which a soldier of his own volition can release this land to the public.

Mr. NORRIS. Unless he resides on it six months.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Unless he resides on it six months and then executes a relinquishment.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but if he did not reside on it six months, if he never resided on it, it would be shut out from entry forever, would it not?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Until the Land Office itself should enter a contest and thus free it. The result of it would be a large number of special agents looking over the country at the expense of the Government to find out the cases where the soldier did not return or did not make his settlement or other improvements.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I do.

Mr. WALSH. I rose to say, with the permission of the Senator from New Mexico, that it would not be tied up forever.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator. I have had my attention called to the provision. It would be subject to contest.

Mr. WALSH. After six months.

Mr. NORRIS. After six months—after the other six months had expired.

Mr. WALSH. Six months after the soldier was mustered out?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. If he did not take up his residence upon the land it would be subject to contest by the first outsider who came along.

Mr. NORRIS. I think that is right.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I do.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator has spoken of the possibility of tying up land under the proposed joint resolution. I want to ask the Senator whether under the Fall amendment as contained in the conference report exactly the same situation does not occur, and whether every acre of land in the West may not be tied up by applications for entry that must remain until the conclusion of the war?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, the Senator is undoubtedly right about that. Without this joint resolution the soldier has the right to relinquish at any time, and thus free the land; but with this joint resolution, under the law itself, there is absolutely no relief from that entry.

Mr. LENROOT. Then I want to ask the Senator this question: If the last proviso in the Fall amendment were omitted by joint resolution, this conference report not being amended, would not that solve the entire difficulty, giving these young men from 18 to 21 the same rights and no greater rights than those who are older?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I really feel, as I said in the beginning, that the purpose of all this is a decidedly commendable one, but we have got to do something with respect to those entering the Army who are more than 21 years of age and who have made entries upon the public domain.

Mr. LENROOT. We already have taken care of those by existing law.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I must confess that I am not familiar with the law to which the Senator refers.

Mr. LENROOT. We already have legislation that fully takes care of that situation, but the difficulty is that the existing law does not permit a man over the age of 21 to make entry outside of the district in which the land is located. The Fall amendment does not permit that.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I was rather under the impression that we would necessarily make some liberal provision with regard to those over 21 years of age who have entered the Army, but if the Senators feel that sufficiently liberal provisions have already been made, then it seems to me that these boys under 21 ought not to have any greater privileges than those who are more than 21 or just 21 at the time they make the entry. The effect of this joint resolution, however, undoubtedly is to make it possible to tie up land, and that will probably be done in many localities of the country. The land will be tied up; it will stop further settlement; it will stop progress in these communities and prevent people who want to actually go upon the land during the war and farm it from doing so.

That will be the effect of this joint resolution. Whether or not the situation should be again reviewed is a very delicate question. We have passed the bill. I was heartily in favor of the main purpose of the bill, and undoubtedly in hearty sympathy with my colleague [Mr. FALL] when he was trying to do something to protect the rights of these boys under 21 years of age; but this is the situation that is now presented. I do not see why the boys under 21 years of age should be restricted in their relinquishments when you do not restrict those above 21 years of age. I do not think there will be any more speculation in the one case than in the other. There may be a number of new entries; but, under the existing law, if you simply have in view a future relinquishment, I apprehend that the number of entries will not be nearly so great as the number you will have if this joint resolution passes, and you make it for the benefit of some cattleman to monopolize the land in his section of the country.

Mr. LENROOT and Mr. STERLING addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield; and, if so, to whom?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin. I heard his voice first.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to call the attention of the Senator to the distinction. Over 21 years of age the men now in the military service can not make their applications to enter at all unless they happen to be home on a furlough in the district in which the land is situated. Under the provisions of the Fall amendment such a man may make an application anywhere in the United States or in France, wherever he may find an officer authorized by the law of the State to administer oaths. Therefore it does open the door to possible speculation of men between 18 and 21 years of age, because they may make applications outside of the district, whereas, as a matter of fact, there will be very few applications to enter upon the part of men in the military service, because they are not and can not be within the district in which the land is situated.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I must confess that, upon reflection, I believe very grave objection may be urged to that provision in the bill as it passed the Senate permitting these entries to be made outside of the district where the land is located.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. From the Senator's discussion I infer that he is of the opinion that the joint resolution applies to those under 21 years of age. Does the Senator from New Mexico so construe the joint resolution?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I understood that it did.

Mr. STERLING. Does it not apply to any entryman, whether he is 21 years of age or under 21 years of age? I take the joint resolution in its general terms. It is not limited in its terms to persons under 21 years of age at all, but it applies to the relinquishment by any entryman prior to six months after his entry and forbids the relinquishment until after compliance with the lawful period of six months.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, as I stated in the beginning, this joint resolution was only presented to me just a few minutes ago, and I have not had an opportunity to study its provisions; but it was presented here in connection with this conference report, and it was stated by the chairman of the committee that the purpose of it was to take care of those who were permitted to make land entries under this proposed law. If it goes further and prevents those above 21 years of age from making relinquishments, it seems to me it becomes almost vicious. I do not accuse anyone of having a vicious intent, but in my judgment its operation would be so far-reaching as to make it even more unwise than if it were limited to those under 21 years of age.

I do not know just what to suggest in this condition. This conference report ought to be adopted, I think, without any doubt; but this does raise a complication here with reference to these lands which may be very serious indeed.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I just want to make a correction.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. STERLING. I think I was in error in suggesting that the joint resolution applies to entrymen generally. The first part of the joint resolution, as I now read it, relates to this act and to the section under which persons under 21 years of age are permitted to make entry, and therefore I think it can only apply to them.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That was my understanding, Mr. President. I am at a loss to know just what action the Senate should take under the circumstances. Here is this very great mischief which it seems to me is bound to follow this legislation.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. Let me suggest to the Senator from New Mexico that the situation is one that is embarrassing any way you look at it. In the first place, it seems to me it would be most unjust to these young men who are just about to become 21 years of age, so that they would be able to avail themselves of the provisions of the homestead law, to take them away and send them out of the country so that they can not avail themselves of its provisions, and let the men who stay at home absorb the lands during their absence. It was that situation of affairs that the amendment undertook to take care of. I had a very interesting letter from a farmer in my State who wrote me: "I have a son coming 21 years of age. He wants to make a homestead entry as soon as he reaches his twenty-first birthday. He is in the draft, however, and is liable to be called away at any time. Can not some provision be made so that he can make an entry before he goes away?"

That was the situation that we undertook to take care of, but anybody must recognize that the amendment as it was adopted is fraught with very great danger. I can readily understand that the land sharks will get busy at once to get these boys to make entries and to take over relinquishments, which they will peddle around the country. But the Senator from New Mexico is correct in saying that with the provision that they shall not relinquish until after they have resided upon the land six months the land will in a way be tied up. I suggest to the Senator from New Mexico, however, that we can take care of that, can we not, by subsequent legislation amending and safeguarding this joint resolution, which ought to go into effect at once?

No harm at all can be done if the corrective measure is delayed even a matter of six months; and ample time will be afforded to amend the joint resolution in any particular so as to give some liberality, if that seems advisable, in the matter of the execution of relinquishments, before the time prescribed by the joint resolution. So, I suggest to the Senator from New Mexico, will he not consent to allow the joint resolution to go through as it stands, and then, in our own good time, when we can give the proper care and proceed with the proper deliberation and thought, let us make such an amendment as will take care of the situation?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I realize the force of what the Senator from Montana has just said. I am not satisfied, however, that that is the best thing to be done, even in this very contingency. Would it not be better to eliminate by a separate joint resolution that provision in the bill which gives the right to these soldiers, though absent from the district, to make these entries? As the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] has very well said, if the entries must be made in the district where the land is, the danger of abuse is quite remote, in my opinion—that is, abuse of any widespread nature. Instead of passing this joint resolution, would it not seem better to pass another joint resolution repealing that provision of the statute, and, if we find later on that the boys in the Army want to make entries upon the public domain in good faith for their own use and benefit, and that it should be done, then let us with proper safeguards pass legislation covering the situation as it may present itself then?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I have no desire to interfere with the discussion of this joint resolution in its proper place, but it is no part of the report of the conference committee. It can not be, as it was not a part of the bill. My inquiry, therefore, is whether the subject of discussion is not and must not be the conference report until it is disposed of?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In response to the question of the Senator, the Chair will say that, of course, the joint resolution is not before the Senate; but under the rules a Senator can discuss any other subject he pleases to discuss.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I think it must be apparent that this subject is directly involved in this conference report. If it were not for the legislation in this conference report there would be no joint resolution here and no discussion at all of this subject.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. FALL. In order to secure the idea of my colleague upon the amendment itself that is embraced in the conference report, let me ask my colleague if he objects to that?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I must say that that provision as it is in the conference report ought to be dealt with in some way or other. As I said some time ago in my remarks, I think the purpose of this legislation is entirely commendable; but there ought to be some sort of safeguard thrown around it to prevent something which is sought to be met by the joint resolution now proposed and which I understand meets with the approval of my colleague.

Mr. FALL. I will state my position later.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. Why can we not adopt the conference report and then discuss the joint resolution afterwards and amend it, if it needs amendment? The joint resolution can be passed on some other day. It can be referred to the Committee on Public Lands. To expedite the draft law it is very important that this conference report should be adopted immediately.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I wanted to have Senators understand the full situation, because the chairman of the committee said that the provisions of the conference report ought to be modified somehow and proposed the modification. I wanted Senators to understand the effect of the proposed modification and the effect of the law as contained in the conference report. I shall interpose no objection to the adoption of this conference report because of the immense importance of the measure, but I do think that every entry on public land ought to be made in the same way, and I am inclined to believe that no serious injustice can occur until we can get around to meeting it in some way, either by amending the law which we are just passing or by making some other safeguard.

Mr. McCUMBER. Before the Senator takes his seat I want to ask him if he does not think that there is another evil in this legislation, the evil being in producing in the minds of hundreds and thousands and millions of our young boys the impression that there is something held out to them of value in making an entry upon any of the public lands that are now left in the United States, after having eliminated from the general public lands those that are held as Government reserves, and so forth. I know something about it in my State. I know something about the question in other States. I am inclined to think that it would be very difficult for any boy or any man to pick up now a single quarter or the enlarged homestead acreage and make a living out of it on any of the public lands. It does seem to me that we are holding out to these soldiers an inducement which they will never realize.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, it is precisely that danger, along with others, which caused me to withhold my signature from an approval of the report on the joint resolution. I do not see why the boy here in Washington, who has never been away, who does not know anything about the public lands of the West, should have a right to sit down here in Washington and make an entry of public lands and hold it up until after the war is over, and at no time have any intention of ever making it his home.

If you are going to permit a boy under 21 years of age to do that, I do not see why any citizen of the United States residing east of the Mississippi River should not have the same privilege. But heretofore in all of our land history it has been deemed unwise to permit people to make entries upon the public domain without at least going into the vicinity where it is located.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. FALL. That is what I was inquiring about. Then my colleague opposes the legislation as it was adopted in the bill before the Senate and is now embraced in the conference report? His opposition goes to the amendment?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I believe that really is the seat of the difficulty in my mind.

Mr. FALL. That is what I wanted to know, because I expect to speak in reference to it, and I wanted to understand whether my colleague's objection was to the amendment which has been adopted or whether his objection is to the proposed joint resolution.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. As I have heretofore iterated, this whole matter comes up just at the moment; and, as I have said, just what remedy should be adopted by the Senate I am not firmly convinced of. I see these dangers ahead and I think that they are problems which ought to be worked out some way, and I trust the Senate will work them out.

I am not opposed to the provision of the bill which gives a boy under 21 years of age who is drafted into the Army the same right as one who is over 21 years of age. I do not oppose that. I think he is entitled to it. I think under the circumstances we should give him the right to vote, if we had the power here to do it, and make him a citizen of the United States; that we should make him the equal in every respect of the man who is above 21 years of age; but when we come to these land entries outside the district, outside the State, outside the entire section of the country where the public lands are located, it is an entirely different matter.

Mr. THOMAS. Under the rules and practice of the Senate, Mr. President, we are required to accept a report of a conference committee in its entirety or to reject that report in the same way. As important as I know this bill to be, if the rule were otherwise I should feel constrained to interpose an objection to one feature of this report, and while adopting the rest insist upon another conference in regard to it. Since that can not be done, I shall not attempt to further prolong consideration of the report, although I would record my protest against the action of the conference committee, and particularly the conference committee of the Senate, regarding that feature of the bill.

I refer, of course, to what is known as the work-or-fight proviso, which I consider, Mr. President, as important a feature of the bill as it passed the Senate as any other portion of it, if indeed it is not in some respects more important than the remainder. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar] during the discussion of that proviso spoke in terms of inspired prophecy when he said the House would not accept it, that the Senate would recede from it, and that the proceeding would be more or less farcical.

Mr. President, we expended two days of valuable time in the discussion of that proviso, and upon a final vote it was retained in the bill by the decisive majority of eleven, and among those voting to retain it were the three members of the conference committee. I had some reason to believe that because of that result, and particularly because of the sentiments of the three members of the conference committee, some strenuous, earnest effort at least would be put forth to compel the House conferees to accept it in some form rather than abandon it and report the bill back for final approval without it.

I confess, Mr. President, that I am disappointed in the result, deeply disappointed, because I apprehend that in consequence of the elimination of this proviso the evil at which it was aimed will continue to increase until it assumes proportions too great even for so-called union labor resistance to it to prevail.

Mr. President, it is just as important, just as necessary to a successful outcome of the war, that the man at home should exert his greatest efforts at all times as it is that the soldier at the front should do the same thing, and if the man at home will not do it, then it is just as important that the Government to which he owes allegiance should compel him to do it as it is that that Government should compel the soldier at his post of duty to obey orders and carry out the requirements of his commander.

It has been said that there is no need for this sort of legislation. That statement is based upon two grounds—first, that the occasion does not exist in the country requiring it; and, second, that existing legislation is ample. Mr. President, no man who has kept pace with daily events can successfully maintain the first proposition. There is not only occasion for this sort of legislation, but the evil at which it is aimed is of constantly increasing and sinister proportions. I do not believe a day passes now which does not bring with it a disturbance somewhere in the great productive industries of the country tending directly or indirectly to slacken and lessen production. I do not believe that there are many such instances which are not grounded upon the demand of labor itself either for better wages or shorter hours or both; and inasmuch as they have constantly almost without exception been granted, to the end that production can continue, there is no question but that they will occur hereafter, as they have occurred in the past, stimulated by the successes of those to which I refer.

There may have been instances in which these demands have not been complied with, but they are very few. I noticed the other day that Mr. Garfield flatly refused a demand on the part of the United Miners of America for an increase in wages, a most commendable act, one indicating patriotism and firmness, and an act which as far as I know has been accompanied by a concession or a withdrawal of the demand, and the work of coal mining proceeds. Now, that may be or may not be the only instance, but I can recall no other.

If I offered to read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 10 per cent of the letters and clippings which have been forwarded to me during the past week calling attention to bad labor or working conditions in different parts of the country, and the Senate admitted them to the columns of the RECORD, the issue for to-morrow morning would in all probability require 500 pages of closely printed matter. Of course I shall not do that. It is not necessary to do it, since other Senators have doubtless received similar communications, and the country in general knows what the facts are.

On the 12th day of March, 1918, the National Industrial Conference Board on Strikes in American Industries in War Times reported that from April 6 to October 6, 1917, there were 2,521 establishments the existence of which was definitely verified by the board, complete information being received from only 1,156. The information from the 1,156 showed that 283,402 men had been idle and 6,285.519 days of production lost. I venture the assertion that the number of days lost, the number of strikes occurring, and the number of men out of employment in consequence of them since the 6th day of October up to the present time are far more than double the amount then reported, and because of the excision of the proviso in this bill it will probably increase in progressive ratio until the patience of the country shall have been exhausted and Congress then brought to book by public opinion for failing to do its duty.

This morning I received two letters, to which I will refer, both bearing directly upon this subject and indicative of similar conditions, unfortunately, in many other parts of the country. The first is from Boston, Mass., and is signed by Maxwell J. Lowry, of the Avery & Lowry Co. He says:

BOSTON, MASS., August 28, 1918.

Hon. C. S. THOMAS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Pardon me for again trespassing on your time, but the inclosed letter in the Boston Transcript of last evening is, I believe, a fair statement of the condition existing in most of the yards where ship work for the Government is being done. I know that the son of a friend of mine is working in the Fore River yards at Quincy. He is earnest and industrious and wants to use his time to the best advantage, but he finds it absolutely impossible to do this. Loafing and general inefficiency is the rule, and anyone who undertakes to do a fair day's work very quickly finds himself in trouble. The situation is deplorable, and some way must be found to remedy it or we are going to have very serious trouble, and, as it is at present, the cost is outrageous.

Respectfully, yours,

MAXWELL J. LOWRY.

He incloses a clipping which I will also read into the RECORD. The clipping is to the editor of the Transcript.

NEWTONVILLE, August 23.

To the EDITOR OF THE TRANSCRIPT:

The inclosed letter, which I have received from a college student who wished to do something useful while waiting his call to the colors, seems to me to throw some light on the reason why our emergency fleet is costing so much. Obviously, the blame can not be placed on those at the head, but seems to rest on the bosses. I might add that this student soon found employment at a small yard, under the superintendence of the owner, which was very efficiently managed. He is now with the colors.

CHARLES GARDNER.

Then follows a quotation from the young man's letter:

I applied at the gate of the T—— shipyard on Friday morning in the cold rain, in my work clothes. There were some 20 others waiting, too, and they did not seem hopeful. Some of them had waited four or five days already. There did not seem to be any scarcity of labor. Finally I got tired of waiting and returned to my room for my letter, which admitted me to see Mr. Dash. He did not seem at all pleased to see me. He said they were overrun with college students, but when I offered to do anything in the plumbing, machinist, or electrical line he said I could come back at noon if it stopped raining, and he would have something for me. The rain did stop temporarily, so I stood outside and waited. He came out and looked over the fence at the wet multitude and told me to come in. I was introduced to a foreman, who introduced me to other foremen. They all advised me not to work too hard. We then crawled about the newly launched ship, which is not yet finished inside. We finally crawled through some holes into an open well, in which is the beginning of the engine, which is, of course, very large. The uprights, which are to support the cylinders, are in place, and they are hoisting on the connecting rod bearings. The work is on such a large scale it does not require much intelligence. I sit on top of the supports, unscrew bolts, scrape the rust off them and put them back. Any roustabout could do it as well as I. The noise is so great that one can not hear when spoken to, and one can not hear oneself sing, which is rather an odd sensation. Castings are lowered down the shaft over my head, and the rain pours down upon it; also red-hot rivets are tossed across the shaft overhead, which are usually caught, but quite often missed, when they may and quite often do fall on anyone below.

No one works much, just enough to keep moving, and not that when they can get out of sight. It is very tiresome. If we should hurry we would get out of work and the bosses could not get their pay for overtime, which is half again as much. I am only a cog in a very slowly moving mass and can not move any faster. Men do only the minimum of work and don't want me to ask for more. We all kill time, and get very tired and dirty doing it. If we could only get on some smaller job, such as a patrol boat, where we could work ahead without loafing! The men working here are mostly doing so to escape the draft. I can't understand how men can loaf and pretend to work under such conditions all their lives. This plant works at about one-third its possible efficiency. This State is supposed to be dry, but it leaks badly. When men do not appear in the morning there is usually a reason. If I could get a day off I would investigate other yards in this vicinity, but if I am fired I can't go elsewhere. All the college fellows are tired of it here, but all want to do real work. One feels sorry for the poor fellows outside the gate, mostly willing to do anything if they could get in, but if they did would be obliged to do as the rest of us.

When your boss insists upon loafing, you can't help it. Several thousand men are employed here and the company seems unable to keep tab on them all. As it is we cheat the Government, the company, and ourselves.

The other letter bears the same date and is from the city of New York. It is signed by Albert L. Siff. He says:

On or about the 31st of July last, Joseph Shea, one of the business agents of the Amalgamated Men's Clothing Cutters Union, announced when in our office to Mr. Max Siff and myself that pursuant to the policy of his organization (which is professedly socialistic and has improper pacifist aims) they would compel a payment of $8 to $12 per week per man more on Government work than what they required on civilian work. We ordered him from our place, and he signaled to five members of his organization to leave their tables. The men subsequently ratified the act of their agent, because same really represented the attitude of their union. We pointed out to them that their stand was tantamount to an announcement that to them their union came before their country.

A few days later when we laid these facts before the president of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, he advised us that we were waiving the American flag and that that practice had gone out of date; that it might have been all right at one time, but it was no longer in order. From his conversation, we could easily see that he was neither in favor of war work or our country's position in regard to the war.

The day after our meeting with Mr. Hillman, the president of the Clothing Workers' Union, we met him at the conference of the Labor Adjustment Bureau at the Quartermaster General's Department of the Army. He came to the conference to answer charges brought against his organization by 50 or more manufacturers, that his men were laying down; that is, they were curtailing production and forcing higher wages than what they required on civilian work. Numerous Government inspectors were present to testify that they had discovered that production had fallen off considerably, and that union officials had boldly announced that the decreased output was all that they would allow. All that Mr. Hillman could say in answer to the above was that he was frank to admit that about 5,000 out of the 100,000 members of his organization had gone into the military service; to say nothing of many others who had gone into other businesses or had taken other employment, and that since some of these men would be again looking for their jobs when the war was over, his organization took the position that they would hold said jobs for them and would not allow men to be taken from less essential activities who could easily be trained to cut and make the uniforms which our increasing Army needs in greater quantities as time goes on.

It was pointed out to Mr. Hillman that his position was very narrow; that our soldiers in France could not wait on his union for the uniforms which they needed, and that the number of workers required to turn out the uniforms needed should be gotten wherever possible; that his organization must not interfere with the introduction and training of new men. I do not know whether Mr. Hillman is an American citizen or not. In any case, he is probably not more than one in name only. I believe that he votes the Socialistic ticket, if he votes at all. I am satisfied from statements that he and some of his heelers have made to me, that at heart he favors Germany.

Clothing workers that are members of the amalgamated union are causing no end of trouble. The administration seems loath to force the issue, because our Federal legislative bodies have not taken a definite stand as to such matters. Since differences of opinion, disagreements, etc., between employer and workers could easily be arbitrated by designating a labor court as part of the personnel of each company; that is, same could consist of two men representing the workers; two men representing the office, and one outsider selected by the other four. Appeals could be taken from decisions of this court of five to the Labor Adjustment Bureau. In any case, the fact that all matters would have to be referred to this special local court would prevent the workers from trying to put anything over and would prevent the manufacturer from trying to get away with anything, so that much of the differences and difficulties would thus be obviated. I believe that if such provision is put into a general bill prohibiting strikes or other interference with work, or any practice which reduces or retards production, that same ought to prove acceptable to all proper thinking Americans. It will not be aimed at the honest American workingman who has stood by his machine and has done his bit. It would be aimed at only such people as referred to above, who really are not Americans.

Col. Wells, supervising manager of Government work in our plants, was present at the conferences, etc., when Mr. Hillman declared himself as above reported. He and I shall be glad to be called upon by you for any additional information that you may require. We will be glad to be of further service to you.

Very truly,

ALBERT L. SIFF.

I repeat, Mr. President, these letters are representative ones and are read simply because they were received at the same time on yesterday and sent over from the office building to my desk by my secretary.

Mr. President, the proviso which I am discussing, under the Cummins amendment to it, anticipated in some degree the suggestion of the last writer, and would seem to comply with his view, which is a very sensible one, of the course which legislation upon this all-important subject should take or should have taken.

Mr. President, how is it possible for any man to deceive himself by saying that this is a matter which may right itself and about which we need no further legislation?

This brings me, Mr. President, to a brief consideration of the other basis upon which I understand this legislation is said to be unnecessary, and that is a provision of similar import in the existing law. I discussed that during the pendence of the bill, and I do not care to occupy the time of the Senate by repeating what I there said; but if it be true that the existing law is ample to cover this unfortunate situation, then certainly somebody is to blame for not having applied it to that situation long ago. If we have ample legislation upon the subject, why has it not been enforced; and if we have ample legislation upon the subject which has not been enforced, what reason have we for assuming that it will hereafter be enforced?

I gave the other day the construction which the War Department placed upon this law. That construction is that if a man who is exempted from military duty because he is needed in the shipyards shall quit work or malinger he is to be turned into class A and sent to the front, but if a union organization, an aggregate, to use the Secretary's expression, did the same thing the law is inoperative; in other words, it operates upon the individual but it is powerless to affect the mass. All, therefore, that a man who does not want to work need do in order to escape the draft is to refuse with his companions to do his bit. He is then absolutely immune from the operation of this law so long as he acts in company with others, but he is responsible to the law if, forsooth, he is unfortunate enough to act in his sole individual capacity.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If the Senator would like to have me put it into the RECORD, I will have read into the RECORD exactly what the rule is.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have read it. I presume the Senator from Oregon holds in his hand a photostat copy of what appeared in the Official Bulletin, which I read into the RECORD the other day. When the Secretary was before the committee a few days ago, and after my discussion of this measure, he was interrogated regarding the authenticity of this article in the Official Bulletin and he said that was the construction placed upon it.

Mr. President, I impugn the motive of no man without sufficient ground, and I am bound to assume that the interpretation placed upon that statute is the honest interpretation, the real interpretation, the actual interpretation which it bears in the opinion of the advisers of the Secretary of War. That fact makes the enactment of a proviso like this absolutely imperative. It is the sworn duty of every man in both Houses of Congress to see to it that the men who stay at home because they are more valuable here shall do their duty while at home, failing to do which they should be at once reclassified and required to fight.

I have heard it stated, Mr. President, that one reason for the rejection of this proviso was the possible veto by the President of the entire bill. With all due respect to the committee, I do not think that is a good reason.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I wish merely to say that that did not actuate the committee. I think that possibly somebody suggested the President might veto the bill for that reason, but that was not considered at all in reaching the conclusion which the conferees reached.

Mr. THOMAS. Well, I am very glad to learn it, Mr. President. Of course, the President of the United States has a duty to perform—a very great one—and I assume that when he exercises it he exercises it according to his best judgment and according to a proper sense of what he believes to be his duty. He takes the responsibility; he can not avoid the consequences of his acts. He must therefore, and does generally, proceed with due deliberation; but we also have a duty to perform; and having performed it, then, Mr. President, our responsibility ends and that of the Executive begins.

The reasons, therefore, upon which the rejection of this measure stands are themselves without foundation. I believe that the Senate members of the conference committee should have been as firm and as persistent in their insistence upon the adoption of this proviso as were the Members of the other House in their opposition to it, and should have remained in the conference room until the principle involved in the proviso, in the language of the proviso, or in some other phraseology, was incorporated in the bill.

Mr. President, I do not pretend to be a prophet or the son of a prophet, but I venture the prediction that before this war is six months older we shall be compelled, by reason of increasing aggravated conditions in the industries of this country, to legislate far more drastically upon this subject than this proviso proposes to do. We are going to win this war; God have mercy upon the American who doubts it for a moment; but, Mr. President, if before it is won reverses shall come or disasters shall overtake us, it will not be due to the lack of gallantry and courage upon the part of our soldiers across the seas, but it will be due to the slacker, to the malingerer at home who, exempted because of his special skill from actual service, takes advantage of the exemption by refusing and declining to do his duty. That is a stab in the soldier's back, quite as much so as the actuality which those words involve.

The man who to-day has been delegated to act in one of the producing industries of the country which are essential to the prosecution of the war who fails to give his whole soul and time and attention to the performance of his task is a traitor to the Government which protects him and to which he owes allegiance, and it is the duty of Congress to reach such men just as they have provided punishment for the man who at the front fails in the performance of his tremendous obligations. I feel very sure, Mr. President, that the men at the front possess staying qualities very different from those of the Senate members of the committee of conference. If they did not, I am very fearful that with the snows of winter the German reverses would all be corrected.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I supported and voted for the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. I supported and voted for it because I believed a great principle was at stake and that the Senate of the United States ought to put itself on record. When I talk to Senators about raising an army to fight our battles and ask them if they believe that the Government of the United States ought to claim the right to take every man between the ages of 21 and 30 and put him in the Army, whether he wants to go or not, every one of them answers "Yes; that is the unquestioned right of the Government." If I ask those Senators whether it ought to be left to that own man's volition as to whether he shall stay at home or whether he shall fight, every Senator will answer that it ought not to be left to him at all; that if the Government needs his services upon the battle field he has no right to say that he will not serve the Government there to whatsoever extent the Government demands. If I ask Senators whether or not they think that a soldier ought to be compelled to perform any duty, no matter how arduous, that is necessary to win this war, every one of them will answer me in the affirmative. If I ask them, on the other hand, whether or not every American, man, woman, and child, should perform an honest day's labor for the support of those soldiers in France, every one of them will answer in the affirmative. If I ask them whether or not it should be left to to the individual or to any collection of individuals whether or not they should perform that service to support our Army, every Senator will answer that it ought not to be left either to one man or to any collection of individuals to determine what they would do under those circumstances.

If I ask those Senators whether they deem it just as essential that our productive capacity be maintained at its maximum as that our armies should be maintained at the maximum man power of the country, everyone will answer me in the affirmative. If, however, I go further and ask those Senators: "Will you stand up on the floor of the Senate and vote your convictions that every man ought to be compelled to do an honest day's work for the support of the American Army, just as the soldier is compelled to do his utmost," what will be their answer? Some of them will say, "No; we can not do it." "Why?" "Because Mr. Morrison thinks that it would be a reflection upon the patriotism of the American laborer." Does anyone think it was a reflection upon the patriotism of our American boys when we said, "You must go to the front and face death itself; go, whether you want to or not"?

Mr. President, why this inconsistency? I can account for it only on the basis of political cowardice. We are frightened at a mere shadow. There is no occasion for it. Human nature is about the same in all ranks of life; human conscience is about the same among every class of individuals. If any Senator thinks that it is good political policy to surrender his convictions of right in order to hold the support of the American labor element, I disagree with him. I think, Mr. President, that I could do the laborers no greater injustice than to say that as a class they do not wish to perform an honest day's work; that the laborers do not wish, as a class, to support the American Army in the field of battle. I do not believe that it would affect my political standing to take a position which I know to be right; and I do not believe that there will be arrayed against any Senator or any Representative the union labor of this country because he says to union labor and to all other labor, "We want a full and honest day's work for the splendid wages we are giving you to-day." We are entitled to that service for the benefit of our country and those who are fighting its battles.

Mr. President, the bad system that we have adopted has been mostly responsible for what slacking we have in all our productive industries to-day. This accursed proposition of "cost plus" is at the bottom of all of the evil in the industrial world from which we are suffering to-day. The amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], while it is along right lines, as I said at the time, would not reach the real evil against which it is aimed. It is not so much a question of strikes as it is the slacking that has been encouraged by every foreman, whose salary will be prolonged by reason of the delay in the work, and every contractor whose profits will be enlarged just to the extent that delays and slacking is encouraged.

Mr. President, there appeared in the Washington Post this morning an editorial, from which I have taken merely a little excerpt, to which I ask the attention of the Members of the Senate who are now present. That editorial reads:

The United States is the power house from which extends the live wire that is incinerating the enemy. Keep the home fires burning! Every factory ought to be blazing with energy now, day and night. Every miner ought to be blasting out coal with frantic speed. The shipbuilders should be outrivaling themselves with the riveting machines. The new army that is authorized can not come into existence a moment too soon. The farmers should be figuring on bigger fields and harder work next spring. The women should keep their fingers busy making the clothing required for the new army.

Mr. President, that is a patriotic statement of the duty incumbent upon the American people to-day. Is it being fulfilled in our war industries by those connected directly or indirectly with them to-day? You know it is not.

Are Senators afraid to vote their own convictions because they fear they will offend labor? Let me read to you a letter which I received yesterday morning from a member of a labor union, a strong, ardent, patriotic member, who represents the real patriotism of the laboring class in this country. I would rather have the support of that one patriotic American labor leader than to have the support of 400 of the slackers whom we see at work upon our cantonments and in other places. You who hide behind somebody's suggestion that you will offend labor by doing right will find that out before this war is ended—that fear is just as reprehensible in the House or Senate Chamber as on the field of battle.

Mr. President, I discussed several days ago this practice that was going on under our very eyes and in the shadow of the Capitol. Shortly afterwards I received this letter, excerpts from which I will read for the benefit of those who fear the laborers of this country if they pass a law that will compel every one to do his full duty in our industries—and remember this is from a laborer and a union laborer.

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 26, 1918.

To the Hon. SENATOR MCCUMBER.

DEAR SIR: I read with interest your expressions regarding the idlers at work (?) on the housing job between Union Station and the Capitol. I have been in this city since 1900, and of all the disgusting slacking movements of men and mechanics I think this perhaps the worst. I served as an apprentice, as a journeyman, as a foreman, and as a superintendent of construction. * * * I have been a union man for 35 years, and I believe in a fair day's pay for a fair day's work, and a suitable quantity of men of the various trades or callings to insure the earliest possible completion of the work at hand; but on that and on other jobs that started here last September it appears that the more men that can be put on the pay roll the better it suits the contractor, resulting in the men being in each other's way and a detriment instead of assistance.

On the job I am now on we have two bricklayers at 77½ cents per hour and two laborers at 40 cents per hour, working 8 hours. They lay in partitions with angles and doors and windows 850 to 900 4 by 12 by 12 inch tile, and have scaffolds, and still no one is rushing.

Then he refers to the work on the Government project referred to:

Ten bricklayers on that job are laying 1,300 to 1,400 8 by 12 by 12 inch tile in 10 hours and get paid for 11 hours at $1 per hour, and 8 common laborers at from 50 to 70 cents per hour and 11 hours a day.

According to this letter two men on one job are laying from 850 to 900 of these tiles, while 10 men on the other job with 8 common laborers are only laying from 1,300 to 1,400.

Last September common labor got 28 cents to 30 cents per hour, but just as soon as the "cost-plus" work started every man who would stay on the job was placed on the pay roll, and they began to increase the pay of every craft and calling. It has simply disrupted all labor conditions. Lathers became carpenters and bricklayers. Carpenters were in big demand, and so many were put on the pay roll that no one did a third of the work he could, because the others were in the way and common labor was so thick—and a foreman for nearly every other workman—that they did not work one-third, or even less of the time. I saw four carpenters and two laborers—

That was six men—

set one window frame on the first floor, and they were one and one-half hours at it. I know water boys get $4 a day. A policeman had 15 days' leave, and he was placed on the pay roll as a felt-roof inspector.

He knew nothing about the work, but he needed that easy money.

I have served as a soldier of the United States Army for five years. I have bought Liberty bonds. My two small children have $200 of war-savings stamps. I am trying to live as a citizen of the United States should. I am working for $42 a week—and have had several chances to get $65 to $90 a week, but I do not want any of that graft. So do not think I am a disappointed grafter. * * * I will work on the street—anything to support my wife and children and myself before I will become a part of such reckless waste.

That is $7 a day—pretty good wages—

I feel that you have started in the right way and hope you will get others so interested that something will be done in the right way to stop this waste of men and money.

I shall not give the name or the address.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. MCCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I merely wish to say that it is very interesting to Senators who in the morning walk through the grounds where building is going on and see the way in which it is carried on. This morning I saw three men, one of them driving a nail and the other two watching him to see how it was done. Three men, apparently foremen, were standing to one side watching two other men doing a little shoveling down below. Another man with a pick took a minute or two to find out the place where he would strike the pick. He was getting ready to strike when I left. That is a sort of a sample of how things are going on.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, other Senators have spoken to me along the same line. I ask them, Why do you not speak it out, then, in the Senate? They say, "What is the use? We can not do anything." Well, Mr. President, we can do something if we will stand by provisions in bills such as the one which has been passed by the Senate and which has been surrendered by our committee of conference.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. MCCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. Why is it the Senator blames the Senate and accuses it of cowardice? The Senate voted 40 to 29 along the line of the Senator's argument.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I was not, Mr. President, accusing anyone of cowardice. I referred rather to the general fear of Representatives and Senators of offending labor unions.

Mr. KENYON. I am not objecting to the Senator's definition of cowardice.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I think those who allow their votes to be influenced because of that fear are lacking in courage. I mention no names. There may be many who vote against these provisions because they think they are unnecessary, because they think they are not right; but we ought to have the votes of those who believe they are right, and if we did have them, the vote in support of a proposition of this kind would be overwhelming in both Houses of Congress, because I know what Senators and Representatives tell me when I am talking to them privately.

Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] that unless we take action soon to bring this great country's productive capacity to something near what it ought to be we will be compelled to take the most drastic measures to bring about the production of what we shall need to support our armies in France.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, just a word or two in reference to the matter which the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] have been discussing. I was glad to hear the Senator from North Dakota say that he did not intend to charge any individual with cowardice in the matter of the vote on this or any other question connected with the draft. The Senators must concede that the labor situation in this country is a delicate one; it has been a delicate situation in Great Britain, one which they have had to handle with kid gloves, and which has been recently satisfactorily adjusted.

As I stated here once before, Mr. President, I can not see any reason why there should be any difference between the boy who is compelled to fight or to work in the trenches and the man who is engaged in an essential industry and is exempted for that reason. There is no sound reason why any different rule should be applied to the one than to the other, so far as exemption is concerned; but I take the position, Mr. President, after having in conference fully considered the matter, that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado does not place us in any different position from the position we are in without the amendment being embodied in the bill.

Senators may differ from me about that, but I have a right to my own construction, and I occupy the same position relatively as that occupied by the two Senators to whom I have referred. There is no difference between the effect of this amendment and what can be accomplished under the present law. If there has been trimming on the subject, the Senate has already trimmed when it adopted the proposed amendment of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not like to pass unnoticed, if the Senator will permit me just a moment, the statement he has just made, that there is no difference between this amendment and what can be accomplished under the existing law. I think his statement is technically correct, but it is likely to be very misleading, because due weight will not be given to the condition which he attaches of what can be done under the existing law. The point is that it is not done. The point is that the existing law does not require these men to work or fight, whereas the amendment does require them to work or fight. That is the difference.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is just where the Senator and I differ. I say that the amendment that was suggested by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] as amended by the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] does not do any such thing. Now, I am going to show where the trouble lies, Mr. President. I am going to show in a very few words that the law as it stands to-day is capable of enforcement just exactly to the same extent as the amendment suggested by the Senator from Colorado is capable of enforcement if it were adopted, and there is no greater effect to be given to the one than to the other.

The act of May 18, 1917, after providing for certain exemptions in section 4, contains this provision:

> No exemption or exclusion shall continue where a cause therefor no longer exists.

If a man is exempted from military service because he is engaged in agriculture or any other essential industry, if you please, whenever the cause for his exemption ceases he automatically comes within the draft. There is not any question about that. The language does not need construction.

Mr. POINDEXTER. But, Mr. President——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Let me finish, if the Senator pleases, and then I shall be glad to be interrupted, because I think I can show by the language of the act that there is no essential difference between the amendment of the Senator from Colorado and the law as it is to-day.

Mr. POINDEXTER and Mr. THOMAS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator says that in the case of a man who is exempted under the existing law, when the cause for the exemption ceases the exemption shall cease. Under the existing law the President determines whether or not there shall be cause for exemption, does he not?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. To be sure—the Commander in Chief.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; the Commander in Chief determines that. Consequently, it is in his discretion. At that point the amendment of the Senator from Colorado would intervene and change the law in so far as this class of men is concerned, and not leave it in the discretion of the Commander in Chief to determine whether or not the cause for exemption exists, but specify the cause itself, and specify what shall be the consequences of it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator and I differ as to the construction of the language again upon that proposition, but the Senator will not let me go ahead and explain just what I mean.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. Does the Senator base his statement upon the amendment of the Senator from Iowa to my amendment or upon the original amendment?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The amendment as originally reported to the Senate, without the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa, did not leave us in any doubt whatsoever as to the provisions of the old and the new law, because they were just the same. While the language is different, the effect of the two was exactly the same. But I am going on to show now what I mean when I say that there is no essential difference between the proposition of the Senator from Colorado, as amended by the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, and the law as it stands to-day.

I have read the provision of the act of May 17, 1917, which provides that wherever a man is engaged in an essential industry, where he is exempted because he is engaged in such industry, and the cause of the exemption ceases, he is automatically subject to the draft. I do not mean to say that he would be placed in class 1. He may be a married man 25 or 26 years of age, and he may be exempted for other reasons than because he is engaged in an essential industry; but if he has no dependents and is not exempted for that or a similar reason, but is exempted simply and purely because he is engaged in an essential industry, then, if he stops work, he can be placed automatically in the draft and assigned to the particular class to which he belongs.

That provision of the present law has not been enforced. I am not going to charge anybody with responsibility, except so far as the record discloses it, but I will show why it has not been done. I am going to ask to have read into the RECORD the rule on this subject, which was printed in the New York Times in May, 1917; and I think, as the Senator from Colorado says, that the same statement was printed in the Official Bulletin. I have never seen it denied. Photostat copies of it are used by the War Department now and sent to the draft boards all over the country, and to others who are interested in the subject. I assume, therefore, that it is official. For that reason I shall have it read into the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read the matter referred to.

The Secretary read as follows:

[From the New York Times.]

DENIES DRAFT ORDER IS AIMED AT LABOR—"WORK OR FIGHT" REGULATION HAS NO BEARING ON STRIKES, SAYS BAKER—OUTSIDE HIS PROVINCE—DEPARTMENT OF LABOR EXCLUSIVELY WILL DEAL WITH LABOR—REGISTRATION OF NEW SELECTMEN.

WASHINGTON, May 25.

Secretary Baker issued a statement to-day in which he explained that the order affecting persons of draft age engaged in nonessential industry was not intended to affect the labor situation. The impression has gained ground that the purpose of the order, issued through Provost Marshal General Crowder, was to bring under military control the industrial workers of the country. Secretary Baker said it was not the intention of the War Department to use the draft regulations to affect labor controversies, which must be adjusted by the Labor Department.

Secretary Baker's statement follows:

"My attention has been called to the possibility of some misunderstanding of the order issued through the Provost Marshal General affecting persons engaged in less-essential industries, one suggestion being that this is the beginning of a series of regulations for the purpose of affecting the labor situation in the country. I want to state in the most positive way that this regulation has nothing to do with the labor situation of the country, and it is no part of the intention of the War Department, either in this regulation or any other, to undertake to affect the labor situation of the country by military regulation. The sole purpose of this order is to guide exemption boards in their duty to apply the provisions of the law affecting occupation as a reason for exemption and deferred classification."

The Secretary was asked what effect this regulation would have upon persons temporarily out of employment by reason of strikes. He said:

"The regulation is silent upon that subject, but it is not the intention of the department to permit the draft regulations to be used to affect any such labor controversy, and unemployment by reason of strikes will not be regarded as such unemployment as will cancel either exemption or deferred classification. The whole question of the relation of the Government to labor is for administration by the Labor Department, and the War Department does not intend any indirect interference in it."

A statement explaining conditions that must be complied with by those who have become 21 years of age since June 5 last, and who will be called into service on June 5 next, was made public to-day by the War Department. All persons who have attained the draft age since June 5 last must register, except those excused from registration by reason of being in the military or naval service. All aliens, subjects of allied belligerent nations and neutrals, coming within the same class must register at the same time.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I merely wish to say, if the Senator will permit me, that that is not the article or the statement published in the Official Bulletin to which I referred in my discussion of the proviso.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. This photostat copy is one that was circulated and sent out from the War Department, and I assume that I have a right to say that it is correct. Now, then, what is the order to which that refers? What was the regulation to which that statement refers? The regulation was written in conformity with the law as it stands to-day. The regulation was intended to make a man submit himself to military service whenever the cause for the exemption ceased; and I am going to ask the Secretary to read the regulation, 121L, because I insist that there has been an attempt by regulation to put in force the provision of the statute to which I have called attention.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Section 121L. Reasonable excuse for idleness or nonproductive employment: Local and district boards must consider cases of withdrawal of deferred classification and late order numbers with sympathy and common sense. The designation and definition of nonproductive occupations and employments contained in the foregoing section 121K may be extended by regulation from time to time as necessity may require so as to include persons in other occupations or employments; but for the present and until such extension by regulation, no occupation or employment not included in the list or description of occupations and employments in the foregoing section 121K may be held by any local or district board to be a nonproductive occupation or employment unless a ruling as to whether or not a doubtful occupation or employment is to be considered as nonproductive is first obtained from the Provost Marshal General in the manner prescribed in section 25.

The following grounds shall be accepted by local and district boards as reasonable excuse for temporary idleness or for being engaged in a nonproductive occupation or employment:

(a) Sickness.

(b) Reasonable vacation.

(c) Lack of reasonable opportunity for employment in any occupation outside of those described in the foregoing section 121K or those hereafter specified by regulation or ruling as provided in this section.

(d) Temporary absences (not regular vacations) from regular employment, not to exceed one week, unless such temporary absences are habitual and frequent, shall not be considered as idleness.

(e) Where there are compelling domestic circumstances that would not permit change of employment by the registrant without disproportionate hardship to his dependents; or where a change from a nonproductive to a productive employment or occupation would necessitate the removal of the registrant from his place of residence, and such removal would, in the judgment of the board, cause unusual hardship to the registrant or his family; or when such change of employment would necessitate the night employment of women under circumstances deemed by the boards unsuitable for such employment of women, boards are authorized to consider any or all of such circumstances as reasonable excuse for nonproductive employment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, that is the regulation which was formulated under the provision of the statute that is now in force and to which I have called the attention of the Senate. It was a part of the selective-service regulations prescribed by the President under the authority vested in him by the terms of the selective-service law. That complied with the provisions of the law then and now in force. If that had been lived up to the very thing that the Senator from Colorado now insists upon would be in vogue to-day. But the Secretary of War undertakes to construe those regulations, which were prepared by the Provost Marshal General and issued for the guidance of the local boards, in such way as to practically nullify not only the regulations but the law itself by saying that these regulations are not intended to do what they profess to do and that he does not propose that the regulations shall do what the law says shall be done, and that is to compel those men who are exempted by reason of being engaged in essential industries to go back into the military service if they cease work.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator does not object——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like just to point out what seems to me to be the whole cause of the condition which he is describing. He has had read by the Secretary certain regulations made by the Provost Marshal General, and then he has had read by the Secretary an order or public statement of policy issued by the Secretary of War. Now, the Secretary of War is the superior officer of the Provost Marshal General and can do as he pleases about the regulations made by the Provost Marshal General and give them such application as he sees fit, exercising his discretion as the representative of the President under the law.

That is all there is about that; and the very statement of the Secretary of War which the Senator has had read with so much detail is in itself proof of the discretion which the administration exercises under the existing law. Congress and the law-making powers of the country, however, are above the Secretary of War. The second section of this bill, as it passed the Senate, contains this language:

When any person shall have been placed in a deferred or exempted class for any of the reasons in this paragraph set forth, he shall not be entitled to remain therein unless he shall in good faith continue, while physically able so to do, to work at and follow such occupation, employment, or business, and if he fails so to do he shall again become subject to the draft.

Does the Senator propose to say to Congress and to the country that if that is enacted into law as the Senate passed it, in the words which I have just read, the Secretary of War will issue a statement of policy setting aside the law of the United States?

That is the difference between the situation that would exist if this clause were adopted and the situation which allows the Secretary of War, as the Senator from Oregon himself has just charged, to set aside the policy and regulations of the Provost Marshal General.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the Senator and I differ again as to the construction of the law. If the Secretary of War or any other branch of the Government can set aside one law, they can set aside another. I claim that there has been set aside a law of Congress which says in express terms that where the cause of exemption ceases the exemption itself shall cease.

That is an express statute adopted by the Congress of the United States. I am not criticising the Secretary of War. He has the right to put his own construction on these laws, just as the Senator is putting his construction upon them; but I say that if he got outside of and beyond the law, then there is nothing in the present proposal that will prevent him from getting outside of and beyond the law again. That is what I am insisting upon.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. As I understand, then, it is the attitude of the Senator that even if Congress were to adopt the Thomas-Cummins amendment the Secretary of War would interpret it the same as he already has interpreted the existing law?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. He might do it.

Mr. NELSON. And we would be helpless?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Absolutely.

Mr. NELSON. In other words, we are at his mercy?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Absolutely, so far.

Mr. NELSON. I can realize that. I have had two resolutions passed here, calling upon the War Department to report what commissions have been issued to officers who are not in the active service, either here or abroad. I wanted to get at these swivel-chair officers. The resolution has been passed twice, the last time over two months ago, and we can not get any response from the War Department.

The War Department practically says: "We do not care a continental for Congress. We will do as we have a mind to." The last answer they made to the resolution that I sent in was that they would have to send to the Philippine Islands and to Hawaii and to Guam, I believe, before they could answer that resolution and know how many swivel-chair officers they had here in Washington and at other places.

Does the Senator from Oregon feel confident that the Secretary of War will regard any law that we pass upon this subject? Will he not feel that he is a power above Congress, and exercise his authority according to his own sweet will?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I do not want to assume the attitude of a critic of the Secretary of War particularly, or to say what he may do in the future. I am only telling what he has done, and that we could not expect him to do more if we adopt the Thomas amendment, because the Senator from Colorado emasculated his proposal when he proposed that the President should adopt rules and regulations for the enforcement of the law.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator that that emasculation was not mine? I accepted it in committee in order that I might secure something in the way of legislation upon the subject.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have not seen the Senator trying to get it out.

Mr. THOMAS. I have not attempted to get it out because I finally consented that it might go in in committee. I did not want it there.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, we consent to have things go out in conference committees because the majority of the conferees are against them. I do not like to stand here in the Senate and be criticized for conditions which prevail and for which I am not responsible, but I have been serving on these committees long enough to know that a man is guilty of the greatest folly when he undertakes to do a thing that he knows can not be done in view of the majority against him. All legislation is a compromise. Life itself is a compromise.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Has the Senator before him the provision of the original draft law which he claims provided that a man who ceased his work in an essential industry should thereby automatically become subject to the draft?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator be kind enough to read it?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is section 4 of that act:

No exemption or exclusion shall continue when a cause therefor no longer exists.

Now, could a law be made more explicit than that?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not know whether it could or not, but in view of what the Secretary of War says in this clipping from the New York Times that the Senator has caused to be put in the RECORD, I should think an attempt to be more specific would be warranted. I say that because, in view of the language the Senator has just read from the original draft act, if the Secretary says, as he is quoted here, "unemployment by reason of strikes will not be regarded as such unemployment as will cancel either exemption or deferred classification," it seems to me that it would be the part of wisdom for Congress to attempt to make it more specific, in the hope that the Secretary might be brought to construe the language adopted by Congress in the plain, ordinary acceptation of the words as usually used.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am sure that the Senator from Colorado intended to do that, and I am sure that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] feels that the Thomas amendment does that; but I take the position that in view of the fact that the President is to make rules and regulations, the authorities can make any kind of rules and regulations they please for the enforcement of the act, and adopt substantially the same rule that they have adopted heretofore.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But even in the present amendment to the draft act, wherever the President is authorized to make rules and regulations for the enforcement of the provisions of the act a proviso is inserted that the rules and regulations shall not be inconsistent with the provisions of the act.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is not so stated in this particular section.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is in the one that we are now adopting, in the conference report.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That would be the rule of construction, anyway.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course it would. It ought to be.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It would be the rule whether it said so or not.

Now, Mr. President, I have undertaken to show why the conferees reached the conclusion they did. There was no assurance to the conferees that the same rule would not be adopted under this Thomas amendment as that adopted under the present law; and therefore it was a work of supererogation to undertake to continue in the bill the Thomas amendment, in view of the fact that the law in other language is now on the statute books.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat, I should like to suggest that the regulation which was read, as I gathered it, referred to nonessential occupations or industries.

Mr. THOMAS. The first part of it did.

Mr. FLETCHER. I gathered that all of it referred to the decision as to whether or not a person was engaged in a nonessential industry. That decision was subject to be passed upon by the Provost Marshal General and changed. This, of course, refers to the classification of drafted men who are engaged in what are called essential industries; and when that condition ceases to exist, then they are subject to be redrafted.

Mr. THOMAS. I may say to the Senator, so far as that is concerned, that the announcement in the Bulletin, I think of August 21, applying that provision only to men who cease in their individual capacity to work, and not applying it when they cease in the aggregate to work, gave a direct construction to it which virtually rendered it inoperative.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was under the impression, after reading and hearing the regulation read and the construction sent out by the Secretary of War, that they did not intend to cover this sort of situation, and that they referred to other conditions.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If the Senator will pardon me just a moment and will look at the preceding rule and regulation, he will find that that covers the nonessential industries, while the one I have read covers both. It is known as the "work-or-fight" regulation.

Mr. THOMAS. My construction of it was that it covered both, as I heard it read.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was thinking that possibly the construction of the Secretary of War was based upon these regulations, which necessarily fall within the restrictive limitations of this section.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Let me say that the Navy Department is applying exactly the same rule. It has been applied in a number of cases. It was applied, I am informed, at the shipyards in Norfolk, and there are other cases where the same rule has been applied.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have listened with much interest to the remarks of the chairman of the committee concerning the proviso, and I must come to the conclusion that his views regarding its character and importance have changed, because I find that in the report upon the bill, which the Senator prepared, he makes this reference to what was then called the amendment:

The young man not engaged in these occupations must wear the uniform, enter the ranks, and bare his breast to the weapons of the German Army. He can not refuse to work even for an hour, and he is compelled to fight whether he feels disposed to do so or not. In view of this, when a young man is exempted from the draft solely in order that he may engage in essential industry he ought to continue in that employment in good faith while any grievance he may have is being adjusted by the industrial board, and if he fails to do so he ought to be placed in the same category and be subject to draft just as the young man is compelled to do who was not exempted to work in such industry and who has been compelled to go to the battle front to fight for his country. The provision does not pretend to interfere with the right of any man to cease labor whenever it pleases him to do so, but simply says to him that if he does cease he shall, under such regulations as the President may prescribe, subject himself to the draft as though he had not been exempted in the first instance.

The justice of this provision, the committee believes, will appeal to the good sense and patriotism of the whole country.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator that I explained why I have changed my view with respect to this legislation. When that report was written by me I had not seen the "work-or-fight" regulation, which I have had read into the RECORD. I had not seen the order which was issued by the Secretary of War, which I have also had read into the RECORD. I had not compared them and analyzed them in the light of the Thomas amendment and the law as it stood and now stands on the statute books. A man who, when he finds out the facts, will not change his mind never gets anywhere. I still believe in the principle involved in the "work-or-fight" amendment, but if it is to be crystallized into a law, it must be so framed as to be entirely free from misconstruction as well as from the possibility of evasion. That can not be said of the amendment we are discussing and which the conferees have eliminated.

Mr. THOMAS. I think the Senator is mistaken in saying that he had not seen the proviso, because it had been incorporated in the bill before he wrote the report.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am speaking of the original statute. I had not looked at it at the time I wrote the report. Of course I knew what the original statute was because I helped to write it. I mean the original statute about the exemption, but at the time I wrote that report I did not have before me the regulations which had been adopted by the Provost Marshal General, nor did I have before me the order of the Secretary of War construing such regulations.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I wish to take a very brief time of the Senate to contribute slightly to the literature of the general subject under consideration by reading a letter from a Louisiana boy, just a little under 17 years of age. He is very anxious to get into the Army. I think the views expressed by him will be helpful to those who thought that the boys of 18 should not be drafted. The letter is dated New Orleans, La., August 9, 1918, and was addressed to his father. The boy's name is Eldon Costello. He says:

NEW ORLEANS, LA., August 9, 1918.

DEAR DAD: Do you ever feel like you ought and want to help your country in the time of her great need, when she is calling upon every man and woman to do his or her bit?

Do you ever stop to think what you owe her for all she has given you?

You have lived under the folds of Old Glory since you first came into the world, and she has provided means for all to attain success in life if you only try a little.

What I am getting at, Dad, is this: You know a draft law has been passed which drafts men from 18 to 45 years. I am not in that draft, but, Dad, I want and should go.

Everyone is asking me—that is, all my friends, both girls and boys that are soldiers—why I haven't gone yet. When I tell them I am not old enough, they laugh and say, "You're big enough."

Mother keeps telling me I am too young and delicate. She says they would never take me because I am too nervous; but still, in all, I want to go. I've got to go, and you've got to let me. Won't you please let me enlist? You don't want your son to be called a slacker by his friends, do you?

Dad, I know I am not old enough, but, by heck, I am big and husky enough.

Can't you realize that I must?

Don't be a slacker just because you hate to lose your only son. I stand just as good a chance of coming back as anyone else that goes.

If you don't think I am right, talk it over with some one who has good "hoss sense," and let me know the results.

We'll talk it over Sunday when I come up.

Your loving son,

ELDON.

Then in a postscript he says:

Be a patriot—a true-blue son of your Uncle Sam. Don't be a father who doesn't believe in fighting and who has a "conscience that objects."

Mr. President, this young man will be 17 years old on the 6th day of next month. I thought that that letter was worth preserving, and I am glad to read it as an evidence of how the Louisiana boys, even under 18, feel—that it is their duty to do the very best they can for their country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

PUBLIC LAND ENTRIES FOR SOLDIERS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask that the joint resolution reported from the Committee on Public Lands be taken up for consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 169) regulating the operation of section 8 of the act entitled "An act amending the act entitled 'An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States,' approved May 18, 1917."

Resolved, etc., That no relinquishment of any public-land entry made under and by authority of section 8 of the act passed at the second session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, entitled "An act amending the act entitled 'An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States,' approved May 18, 1917," shall be valid or effective for any purpose unless executed after the entryman shall have resided upon and cultivated the land, in the case of a homestead entry, for at least six months, and in the case of an entry made under other than the homestead laws, after the entryman shall have complied with the provisions of the applicable law for at least one year.

Any person, firm, or corporation soliciting or dealing with the relinquishment of such claim or entry prior to the completion of one year's compliance with the applicable law and with this resolution, and who or which solicits, demands, or receives or accepts any fee or compensation for locating, filing, or securing any claim or entry for any person entitled to the benefits of said section, shall, upon conviction, be fined not to exceed $1,000 or imprisoned for not exceeding two years, or both.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether it is the intention to bring the joint resolution to a termination to-day?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I would like to have it disposed of. It affects the administration of the land laws, and its immediate passage would certainly relieve the situation by giving some days' notice.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am not satisfied with the joint resolution, and if that is the purpose of the chairman of the committee I shall have to object to its present consideration.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I regret exceedingly that the Senator feels it incumbent upon him to make the objection, but of course I have no right to undertake to tell the Senator why an objection should not be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made to the consideration of the joint resolution at this time.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives receding from its adherence to its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 1, 61, and 83 to the bill (H. R. 11692) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, agreeing to amendment No. 1, and further insisting upon its disagreement to the amendments Nos. 61 and 83 to the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate Nos. 1, 61, and 83 to the bill (H. R. 11692) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

T. U. SISSON,
JAMES MCANDREWS,
C. R. DAVIS,
Managers on the part of the House.
JOHN WALTER SMITH,
O. W. UNDERWOOD,
CHARLES CURTIS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I move that the Senate further insist upon its amendments still in disagreement, request a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. SMITH of Maryland, Mr. ROBINSON, and Mr. CURTIS conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator from Maryland what are the differences now in conference?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. The playground provision and the Keller amendment.

Mr. KENYON. There is no longer any difference on the half-and-half provision?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. The House has receded.

Mr. KENYON. Is the matter to be held up, then, by these two differences?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. A further conference has been ordered, and we hope to have an early agreement.

STIMULATION OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. GORE. I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate and proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11945) to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purposes of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products."

Mr. FLETCHER. If there is no amendment pending I wish to offer an amendment, which I am sure will be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There are some committee amendments not acted upon. The next committee amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 9, at the foot of the page, the committee proposes to strike out in the total "$1,105,980" and insert "$1,005,980."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, line 23, after the numerals last read, to strike out the proviso in the following words:

Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized, for the official purposes of the Department of Agriculture, and within the limits of the appropriations for rent made by this or any other act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture, to requisition the use of, and take possession of, any building or any space in any building, and the appurtenances thereof, in the District of Columbia, other than a dwelling house occupied as such or a building occupied by any other branch of the United States Government; and he shall ascertain and pay just compensation for such use. If the amount of compensation so ascertained be not satisfactory to the person entitled to receive the same, such person shall be paid 75 per cent of such amount, and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as, added to said 75 per cent, will make up such amount as will be just compensation for such use in the manner provided by section 24, paragraph 20, and section 145 of the Judicial Code.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, after line 17, to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 2. That under such rules, regulations, and bonds as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe distilled spirits or alcohol produced prior to October 3, 1917, from products the growth of the island of Porto Rico may be admitted from said island into the United States for industrial purposes in the arts and sciences. Such alcohol or distilled spirits shall not be used for beverage purposes nor in the production of any article used as a beverage.

Any person violating the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and, upon conviction, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than two years. He shall, in addition, be liable to double the tax evaded, together with the tax, to be collected by assessment or on any bond given.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, after the amendment just agreed to, to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 3. That the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products," approved August 10, 1917, be, and the same hereby is, amended so as to strike out, in section 9, after the words "Caribbean Sea," the following: "into those parts of the United States below the southern cattle quarantine line at such ports of entry as may be designated by said joint regulations and also," so that the section as amended will read as follows:

"SEC. 9. That the act of August 30, 1890, entitled 'An act providing for an inspection of meats for exportation, prohibiting the importation of adulterated articles of food or drink, and authorizing the President to make proclamation in certain cases, and for other purposes' (26 Stat. L., p. 414), is hereby amended so as to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture, within his discretion and under such joint regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Treasury, to permit the admission into the United States for immediate slaughter at ports of entry to be designated in said joint regulations of tick-infested cattle which are otherwise free from disease and which have not been exposed to the infection of any other disease within 60 days next before their exportation from Mexico, South and Central America, the islands of the Gulf of Mexico and the Caribbean Sea, subject to the provisions of sections 7, 8, 9, and 10 of said act of August 30, 1890: Provided, That the importation of tick-infested cattle from any country referred to in this section in which foot-and-mouth disease exists, which existence shall be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture, is prohibited: Provided further, That all cattle imported under the provisions of this section shall be slaughtered in accordance with the provisions of the act of June 30, 1906 (34 Stat. L., p. 674), commonly called the meat-inspection amendment, and the rules and regulations promulgated thereunder by the Secretary of Agriculture, and that their hides shall be disposed of under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture."

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to offer an amendment to the committee amendment. I move to add, after the word "Agriculture," in line 2, page 13, the following proviso:

And provided further, That the slaughter of all such cattle imported into the Territory of Porto Rico may be deferred for such time and under such restrictions as the Secretary of Agriculture may by regulation prescribe, and that the Secretary of Agriculture, within his discretion and under such joint regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Treasury, may permit the exportation of tick-infested cattle from the Virgin Islands to Porto Rico when said cattle are otherwise free from disease.

The two provisions embodied have the indorsement of the Department of Agriculture and were earnestly requested by the Delegate from Porto Rico [Mr. FELIX CORDOVA DAVILA].

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON of California in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Texas to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This completes the amendments of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to offer an amendment which I think will meet with the favor of the chairman of the committee and will encounter no opposition whatever.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. As a new section at the end of the bill, which will be section 4, as follows:

SEC. 4. The President is hereby authorized to extend invitations to other nations to appoint delegates or representatives to the Farmers' National Congress to be held at Jacksonville, Fla., in connection with the Pan American International Farm and Live-Stock Exposition: Provided, That no appropriation shall be granted or used for the expenses of delegates.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to inquire if amendments were adopted when the bill was previously before the Senate with reference to the items on page 3, "production of beef cattle, $105,000," and "live-stock production in the Great Plains region, $100,000." Were those clauses stricken from the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary advises me that they were not.

Mr. KENYON. I move to strike out, on page 3, lines 1 and 2, the item "live-stock production in the Great Plains region, $100,000."

Mr. WARREN. I should like to ask the Senator what is the object of that amendment?

Mr. KENYON. The purpose of the appropriation, as I understand it, is to instruct the people of the Great Plains region how to raise live stock.

Mr. WARREN. And the other clause which the Senator read?

Mr. KENYON. I am going to make a motion as to the other part.

Mr. WARREN. I should like to ask if the Senator proposes to strike it all out; and if so, why he does not include it in one amendment? I do not know that I shall object to that, but I certainly shall object to an attack on the live-stock production in the Great Plains region alone.

Mr. KENYON. Well, I will change my motion. On page 3, line 1, commencing with the word "production," I move to strike out all down to the word "utilization," in line 5.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 1, beginning with the word "production," it is proposed to strike out the following: "production of beef cattle, $105,000; live-stock production in the Great Plains region, $100,000; production of pork, $150,000; production of poultry, $129,600; production of sheep, $60,000; making cottage cheese on the farm, $52,950."

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, before the question is put on that motion I should like to inquire of the chairman of the committee if he has some information from the department itself in regard to these items, especially the item proposing to appropriate $100,000 for live-stock production in the Great Plains region?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I will say that those items were all included in the department's estimates and were inserted by the House of Representatives upon the recommendation of the department. The particular item referred to in this instance by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] is an appropriation of $100,000 to carry on instructions as to live-stock breeding in the Great Plains area. That is in the section of the country which was formerly a great meat-producing section, before it was divided and reduced to small farms. The ranches have been converted into small farms, and the cattle have gone farther west; the big ranches and ranges have gone farther west. This appropriation is to encourage the production of live stock on a small scale by farmers owning, say, 160 acres of land. Of course, everbody knows that in Indiana, Illinois, Ohio, and that region the cattle produced on the small farms are, I believe, quoted higher in the market and constitute the best beef cattle which are produced in the country.

As the ranches and ranges gradually disappear the country is obliged to rely more and more upon the small farmer for its meat supply. This appropriation is to encourage that enterprise.

I may say that within the last year or two years the enterprise of producing sheep has been greatly stimulated in Oklahoma. I was recently advised by the department of agriculture of that State that there are over a million head of sheep in the State now, while three or four years ago there were practically none. To reinsure and reinforce our meat supplies by encouraging a greater production on the small farms is the object of this appropriation, as I understand, and the object of most of the related appropriations.

Mr. WARREN and Mr. STERLING addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment, please?

Mr. KENYON. Who has the floor, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] has the floor.

Mr. STERLING. I supposed I had the floor. I really addressed an inquiry to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. WARREN. I only wish to correct an observation which I previously made.

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming for that purpose.

Mr. WARREN. Since the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] has undertaken to move to strike out all of the section, I can only account for that—and he will correct me if I am wrong—on the hypothesis that this bill is utterly bad, except this one section, and that this one section is so deserving that he wishes to take it out of a bad bill, for surely if there is anything in the bill which is good a great portion of it must be contained in this section.

As those Senators from the Great Plains section will understand, cattle raising is changing there. The cattle now must be raised by the farmers who are coming into that section from other localities and who are settling on the dry plains, putting up silos and conducting the business in an entirely different manner from the method by which the great herds which were formerly raised on the plains were produced and which furnished a great proportion of the supply of beef then used in the country.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I simply wish to say that I have not personally investigated the matter, but I presume the Department of Agriculture had some good reason for asking for this appropriation.

As to the changed conditions in the western part of my State—which really is a part of the Great Plains region—I know as to those changed conditions; and I can see in the statements which have been made some very good reasons for an appropriation here to aid in the production of cattle. It is now a matter of what the individual farmer may do instead of the ranchman with his 500 or perhaps several thousand head of cattle; but I can see that if encouragement is needed in other parts of the United States for this industry it is needed there and will be of great value. I, therefore, hope that this one item will not be stricken from the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Dakota yield to me?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I desire to call the Senator's attention to the fact that quite recently, indeed as late as July 13, a bill was before the Senate, and it passed shortly after that time, which carried an appropriation of $27,875,353, which amount under the provisions of the bill was to be expended by the Agricultural Department. Will the Senator pardon me for inviting attention to some of the provisions of the bill?

Mr. STERLING. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I should like to observe that it seems to me that the provisions in the bill to which I am now calling attention are duplicated, at least in part, by the measure which is now under consideration. For instance, on page 9 of the printed copy of the bill recently enacted I find an appropriation of $503,662—

For inspection and quarantine work, including all necessary expenses for the eradication of scabies in sheep and cattle, the inspection of southern cattle, the supervision of the transportation of live stock, and the inspection of vessels, the execution of the 28-hour law, the inspection and quarantine of imported animals, including the establishment and maintenance of quarantine stations and repairs, alterations, improvements, or additions to buildings thereon.

Mr. STERLING. None of which has any relation whatever to the item to which attention is now called.

Mr. KING. I can not quite agree with the Senator. It relates to the question of cattle raising. I find a further appropriation of $500,000—

For investigating the disease of tuberculosis of animals, for its control and eradication, for the tuberculin testing of animals, and for researches concerning the cause of the disease, its modes of spread, the methods of treatment and prevention, including demonstrations, the formation of organizations, and such other means as may be necessary, either independently or in cooperation with farmers, associations, State or county authorities.

That deals not with large aggregations, but with the farmers, and relates to corporate organizations of farmers.

Mr. STERLING. And I think, Mr. President, the Secretary of Agriculture will say that not one cent of the item last read by the Senator from Utah will be applicable to the great plains region to encourage live-stock production.

Mr. KING. I did not quite hear the Senator, but, as I gathered his meaning, I disagree with the statement he made. This does not limit the appropriation to any particular part of the country, but the investigations may be made and the appropriations may be made in the district referred to in the bill which is now under consideration.

Mr. STERLING. Yes; but if I heard distinctly the Senator's reading of the section to which he refers, the appropriations were for a particular purpose, in the main connected with the raising of cattle, but not referring to live-stock production.

Mr. KING. I find also in this same measure a provision calling for the eradication of cattle ticks; and that $50,000 may be used for live-stock and for dairy demonstrations. That is certainly a duplication of some of the provisions that are found in the bill now under consideration.

Mr. STERLING. No, Mr. President, we make that appropriation every year, and it is well understood for what that appropriation is made. It is for the eradication of cattle ticks in the southern part of the United States, in Texas, New Mexico, and elsewhere in the South, and it does not pertain——

Mr. FALL. I desire to say to the Senator from South Dakota that there is not a dollar of that appropriation which is spent in New Mexico.

Mr. STERLING. It may be that New Mexico has no ticks.

Mr. FALL. We have no ticks there.

Mr. STERLING. It is expended in the tick-infested region of the South rather than in the western part of the country.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. KENYON. I thought the Senator from Utah had about concluded, and I was going to ask him a question.

Mr. KING. I am holding the floor by the courtesy of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. KENYON. I want to ask the Senator from Utah if there is anything in the appropriations contained in the bill from which he is reading instructing the farmers how to make cottage cheese, as there is in this bill?

Mr. KING. I have merely hastily glanced at the measure and I am not sure how many provisions there are with respect to so important a matter as that.

I find also, if the Senator will permit me to occupy the floor in his time for a moment further, an appropriation of $364,390—for necessary expenses for investigating and experimenting in the dairy industry—

I think that would cover the cottage cheese about which the Senator from Iowa required—for cooperative investigation of the dairy industry in the various States, inspection of renovated-butter factories and markets—

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah might read the whole bill through, calling attention to these special appropriations for this or that particular industry, but that has no particular relation to the point in controversy here. This question relates to the production of live stock in the great plains region, and I am objecting to striking out the $100,000 appropriation made by this bill for that purpose. The Senator has not referred to anything whatever relating to the live-stock production in the great plains region. If he has something of that kind, it might be pertinent to this discussion.

Mr. KING. I was calling attention to the very large appropriations, aggregating more than $27,000,000, a portion of which can, and no doubt will be, utilized for the very same purpose as that covered by the item to which the Senator from South Dakota is now calling attention.

Mr. STERLING. I will say to the Senator from Utah that I can refer to appropriations in the pending bill that might properly be called duplications of what we have had in the regular Agricultural appropriation bill, but it is urged that this much more is needed because of the war and because of the necessity of increasing production, and so forth. That is why this bill is before the Senate.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Dakota yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. A part of the motion of the Senator from Iowa is to strike out this clause:

Making cottage cheese on the farm, $52,950.

In connection with this subject, I desire to read the following letter which I received last June:

MARSHALLTOWN, IOWA, June 18, 1918.

Hon. KNUTE NELSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Being a resident of Minneapolis, Minn., of which you have just received the honor of renomination for the Senate, for which please accept my congratulations.

I am a traveling man and 32 years ago used to live at this place in Iowa before coming to Minnesota.

This evening I was calling on some old neighbors and learned a bit of governmental news that surprised me to the extent that I have determined to advise you and for the benefit of the public.

These friends of mine have a daughter, who is a driver of an automobile, and is at present engaged in driving two ladies about the small country towns in this county in Iowa, under Government employ, in the enterprise of educating people or housewives in the way of making Dutch cheese.

This young lady states there are two ladies engaged by the Government in every county in 47 States. These two ladies have a drawing account with the Government, as I understand it, of $12 per day each and a salary of more than $100 per month.

At least this much is known: The young lady driver is getting $7 per day for that, and she says she knows the expenses run to $85 per week besides.

Now, then, is it possible that we have a Government that will during such strenuous times as we are experiencing, calling on the people for money by the billions to push this war to an American victory, use the people's money for such a worthless purpose? This seems worse than paying Gillette, of Minneapolis, $15,000 a year on Hog Island.

I do think such a deal as this should have immediate investigation and punishment dealt the guilty official fostering such disreputable business.

Show me the housewife who knows anything about housekeeping who can not make better Dutch cheese than any grafter going about the country at the expense of the Government.

No one who is an American can refrain from contributing to the progress of the war, but I can not refrain from making this known, if all true, and, judging from the source it comes from, I believe it is true. If of any benefit, I hope you will investigate.

Very truly, yours,

JAS. R. CRYSTAL,
1609 Stevens Avenue, Minneapolis, Minn.

There is an illustration of how the Dutch-cheese propaganda is operating in the country. I commend it to the consideration of the Agricultural Committee and suggest that it would be well to leave the Dutch-cheese item eliminated from the bill.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am going to venture to suggest to the chairman of the committee that it is getting pretty late; I imagine there is going to be more or less discussion on the question of making Dutch cheese to be used for cannon balls or something of that kind, and I think we might adjourn.

Mr. GORE. That would be agreeable to me; but there were those who thought we might be able to finish the bill to-night and adjourn over until Monday. I have not shared so confident a hope as that; and I understand that it is desired to have a session to-morrow in order that the draft bill may be signed by the presiding officers of the two Houses. I therefore move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, August 31, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.
